Posited forion | BELATOLLE'S | Himminated. Ten Cents,

Massasoit's Daughter.

MASSASOIT'S DAUGHTER;

OR,

THE FRENCH CAPTIVES.

A ROMANCE OF ABORIGINAL NEW-ENGLAND.

BY A. J. H. DUGANNE.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS,
No. 98 WILLIAM STREET.

LEET FRENCH CLASSIFE

HERMOTEL BATCHTHE

Maiored according to Act of Congress, to the year 1851, by READLE AND COMPANY,

the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the ficthern District of New York.

sto do lar vo;

the of the long

don

THE FRENCH CAPTIVES.

aptition of the danger Date | history we to be buspects, that he was been president the continue of the fact that belowers our meetings to the state of th

editorioled frame. The serve althought to neglette desired

BOTH WORK OF THE PARTY OF THE PARTY OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF TH

CHAPTER I.

WRECK OF AN EMIGRANT SHIP.

THERE is a dangerous stretch of rocky land inclosing the waters which wash the shores of Plymouth, where, even now, the mariner fearfully guides his bark through dangerous shoals—a narrow promontory, whose extremity pierces Massachusetts Bay, and whose entire length is exposed to all the violence of Atlantic tempests. Even at the present day, the shores of Cape Cod—as the first discoverers designated it—and the storm-beaten beaches which buffet the tide as far as Gloucester Point, are often strewn with the wrecks of shattered vessels, and the bodies of their hapless crews. Scarcely a storm rises, at certain seasons, from the inclement east, that does not leave its dreadful traces on these dangerous head lands; and many a brave ship, returning from some tedious voyage, has here found her grave, even when the roofs of her sailors' homes were visible to their despairing eyes, and the sars of expectant friends were open to their drowning cries.

Hither, in her pride, came a ship of France, with freight of popeful men and trusting women, while in her wake rose the storm-cloud, and before her crouched the hidden forms of unknown reefs. This was in the summer of 1615, while the Pilgrims were still in Holland, though the French had long since peopled portions of Canada and the Islands.

Up into the blue twilight rose that ominous cloud, while spirits of the deep. One of those sudden tempests, that leap at once, like an aroused giant, from the bosom of our northern seas, and scatter destruction around their path, as with mighty strides they traverse the vexed waters-one of those awfu! throes of nature now shook the mounting billows, as a steed's mane is shaken in the battle. The ship bowed before the gale, her tall masts bent like reeds, her high-built prow and majestic quarter dashing away the huge billows which strove to overwhelm her. Onward, with headlong speed, she rushed toward her fate, like a wild horse goaded by the hunter's shaft. Vainly were the flapping sails bent to the straining masts, and heavy anchors launched into the frothy waters. On dashed the ship-on to the rocks with a crash; then there was a shivering heave, and then a dull thump; the crack of parting timbers, followed by a shriek of fear and agony-voices of the terror-stricken, calling upon heaven.

Far above the roar of the storm and the cries of perishing wretches, was heard the war-whoop of the savage as he marked the peril of his stranger foes, and saw that they must perish, or become his captives.

The Indian is a poetic subject for the romancer to endow with the attributes of an unsullied nature—to portray as clothed with chivalric character, and invested with all the rude virtues supposed to belong peculiarly to a state of nomad innocence. But, an Indian painted and decorated for war, in all the glories of shells, feathers, wampum, with a sheaf of arrows, a stone-hatchet, an oaken-bow, oyster-shell scalpingknife, and having a disposition to cut, hack, maim and torture his enemies to the utmost extent of their endurance, is a positive and real object not at all agreeable to encounter; and if our ancestors, of worthy Pilgrim memory, were sometimes inclined to exhibit their herror of such things by making short work of armed savages, we may, perhaps, imagine an occasional excuse for their so doing, by considering the circumstances in which they were placed, as continually threatened by a remorseless race, jealous of their presence, and auxious for their destruction.

62

es te

th

laı

he

Wh

of.

eve

AS I

stre

A SI

It may be fancied that the poor French emigrants, who beheld, from the decks of the stranded ship, the fierce band enticipating their doom, and exulting in its imminence.

abandoned all hope of escape, and gave way to de pair. Children clung about the necks of their mothers, wives were folded wildly in their husbands' arms, friends embraced one another in affectionate farewells-all gave themselves to the terror of the moment, mingling their cries and prayers in sad confusion. The poor wanderers crouched upon the narrow deck, while the daylight faded, the storm howled, and around them dashed the angry waters, sweeping over the reefs, and threatening each moment to ingulf the wrecked vessel. Meantime, the savages had kindled large fires at many points upon the beach, the light of which streamed across the gloomy water, and reached the dismantled ship; and, on the sand, amid the flaming piles, while the rain poured, and the wind shrieked around them, could be seen their dusky forms, as, with pine-knot torches brandished above their heads, they leaped and danced, singing and yelling so loud that every note rung in the ear of the shuddering occupants of the wreck.

The hours passed slowly on, though, alas! too quickly for the unhappy emigrants, who, striving to sustain one another upon the slippery planks, or clinging singly to the bulwarks, looked out through the mist toward the savages circling round their war-fires. It was evident to the despairing emigrants that no alternative but death or captivity among the redskins could be presented to them, even should they succeed in reaching the shore after the final breaking up of the vessel, of which event they were in momentary anticipation. The cap tain, however, a dark-visaged and determined man, had not yet resigned himself to the apathy which prevents thought of exertion. He had weighed in his own mind the chances of escape, and saw that there remained one, at least, in case the tempest should subside during the night. This was to leave the stranded vessel by means of the boats, and, instead of landing, to push boldly for the sea, and then, by skirting the headlands and capes, to gain at least some southern point, whence the English settlement of Raleigh, or the new colony of Maryland, might be speedily reached. Unfortunately, however, such escape could be available only to a few, inasmuch as the main boat of the ship had been swamped during the stress of the gale, and there remained only the pinnace, and a smal cockle-shell affair which could hold but a half-dozen

8

6

E

d

k

al

in

8 -

01 ho

nd

ice.

of the passengers. However, Captain Pierre die not hesitate, but decided upon securing his own safety, whatsoever might be the consequences. He had been used to many adventures, perilous, and, rumor said, illegal; for it was more than suspected by the emigrants who had engaged him to man and master the ship, that the worthy Pierre had, in former years, known a career less peaceful-indeed, that his rightful com panions were rather buccaneers of the Indies than good citizens emigrating for the sake of enjoying quiet lives. The master was not, indeed, a Frenchman, but a Creole of the Spanish main, who had been employed by the emigrants as navigator of the vessel-which they owned in shares; moreover, the crew which Captain Pierre had brought with him were of different countries, and though notable good seamen, were yet on quite familiar footing with their master, so as, indeed, to cause a strong suspicion among the emigrants of a former intimacy existing between the parties, which might suggest many memories of adventure connected with Spanish galleons. Nevertheless, Captain Pierre had contracted for the expedition, and had thus far performed his stipulations, which, of course, could not take into account the disasters and mischances of the ocean.

The Creole captain, at this moment, whatever bad or good actions had been his antecedents, was intent on escaping the fate which at present seemed to menace the whole company. He quietly called to him a dozen of the crew, who were evidently old associates of their commander, and, retiring with them to a space between bulkheads not yet battered by the waves, and near which the pinnace was secured, unfolded the plan he had devised. The rough followers readily acquiesced in their leader's design, though one of them, a blunt fellow, whose round head and bull-dog face proclaimed an English origin, ventured to remark, with an oath:

"Then these poor Frenchmen, with their wenches, will assuredly be eaten by the cannibals on shore yonder. Mass I but it goes hard with my conscience to leave them, Captain Pierre!"

"You are a fool, Robin," answered the Creole, "for the sensible man lives as long as he can, and lets others do the same."

b

H

SC

"And, in good sooth," returned the Englishman, with a laugh, in which he seemed to swallow his scruples, "in good sooth, the French people are fitter to die than any of us rovers, Taptain Pierre; so I e'en think we may give them the slip with quiet conscience."

"Well, knave, out with the pinnace, and make no noise about it," said Captain Pierre; "there's a patch of still water under the bows, and the boat may swing till the backbone of the storm is broken, which can not be long, if the wind blow like this."

At last, a lull in the fierceness of the wind, and thunderrolls dying away in the deep, announced that the gale had spent its violence. Presently the heavy mist that had clothed the waters like a pall, and through which the lightning at times hardly penetrated, began to break in many places, and permit the expiring embers of the Indian war-fires to be seen, marking the line of sandy beach. The savages themselves were no longer visible; but anon, their yells were heard higher up among the woods, and the white men knew that their foes waited but for the morning's light to attack the ship. Thus wore away the dismal hours, the waters still violent and beating upon the wreck, and the shifting clouds now breaking away slightly, and now closing in dense masses. Thus, at length, the midnight hour came and passed, and then, just as a heavy wave was retreating, there sounded a dull blow that seemed po shiver through the vessel, and immediately afterward the great galley, which was built at the ship's stern, broke completely off, carrying with it a portion of the quarter, and a score of men and women who clung along the nettings. A shrick rose from the waters as the dark mass of wood, with its freight of living beings, swept seaward with the ebbing wave, and then a silence as of death settled over all.

But the pause lasted not long, for it was the effect of an agonizing dread, which soon found utterance in words, and gobs, and cries to heaven. In the midst of this sorrowful tumult, a deep voice penetrated the ears of all who had survived the parting of the galley from the quarter:

"Friends, the ship breaks up! An hour hence, and naught but fragments will remain! Let us prepare to meet death like Frenchmen and Christians, and that we may have strengtrected, let us now unite in prayer to our Lord."

It was the voice of Abbe Claude—a priest who had accompanied the expedition, and whose kindly ministries had endeared him to all the emigrants. His solemn accents now fell upon the despairing hearts of his friends with an influence that calmed their terrors, albeit they felt that the prayer which they should offer would be likewise their requiem. At this moment, anothe, voice was heard:

"Comrades, it is good to pray, but it is better to work The storm is now over; let us make a bridge over the rocks with spars, and thus reach the shore."

It was a man of Brit'any who spoke—one high in esteem among his companions, and a murmur of approval greeted his words. He continued

"It will presently be impossible to escape, for, as the good Abbe says, the ship is breaking fast. Therefore, before we pray, let us work, I say, that we may get to the shore. Ho, captain! Captain Pierre!"

But Captain Pierre's voice schaded not in answer to the Briton's call.

"Ho, Captain Pierre! the storm las ceased! let us make a

Then a loud hail came from the gloom which hung around the vessel's side, shrouding the waters, and a quick dash, as of oars, was audible.

"Make ye a raft, an' ye will, friends! It is a good thought But Captain Pierre can not come to ye. Adieu!"

As that farewell sounded, a last flash of lightning lit the surrounding waters, and the dazzled eyes of the wretched emigrants faintly perceived the pinnace, filled with men, rowing with all speed over the black surface, propelled by double oars. A gloom settled over their spirits, and a low creescaped many lips. Even the Briton's voice faltered as he cried:

"Captain Pierre has deserted us!"

"Let us now pray!" said Abbe Claude.

The Briton answered not, and presently the clear, powerful tones of the priest's voice rose sweetly above the turmoil of winds and waves. He prayed upon that parting wreck, amid the shivering forms of his companions, and his words were echoed by moaning cries, and by deep amens from the inmost hearts of his hearers. Sublime was the great tumult of waters beneath his voice—solemn, indeed, the church in which he knelt—the dying at lience whom he addressed.

Then—the ship broke in twain, the whirling billows dashed her shattered timbers upon the rocks, and caught up the thricking wretches who clung to spars and cordage, hurling them remorselessly among the breakers, or bearing them ashore, where murdering enemies awaited, with tomahawks apraised, to wreak their savage cruelties upon such as might escape the ocean's fangs.

As the beautiful sun, which, at its setting, had kissed the gay streamers of the ship of France, arose to fill another daily course, the wrecked emigrants were slain, or captured, or fleeing, they knew not whither, through the dense forest of that unknown land where after-wanderers were to find a less inhospitable greeting, and where was to be born that mighty child of a mighty mother, which the world was to know as Now England.

CHAPTER II.

IN THE WILDERNESS.

Upon the greensward knelt three figures—an old man, a youth, and a fair young girl. The first, by his garb, and the crucifix which he held aloft, seemed a priest: a man with placid face and thoughtful eyes—one of those self-denying, earnest souls, who first dared the perils of our untrodden wills, to plant amid deserts the seeds of eternal life.

Near him was a young man, whose attire, though torn and travel-stained, was yet of costly texture and delicate workman-His embroidered doublet and rich vest, his jeweled belt, and the plumed hat which lay near him on the sward, as well as the diamond-hilted sword that glittered by his side, marked him as a cavalier of rank. Small hope of golden stores had been the inducement to the young Louis de Luzerne to embark on the outward voyage of Captain Pierre, and mingle with the hundred emigrants who sought the shores of Canada, then first explored, and called Acadil by the French. But a higher motive actuated him. He sought a father, long since banished from his native land for some act which had incurred the arbitrary displeasure of his king. Moreover, the young man cherished another sacred duty—the protection of an only sister, whose tenderest years he had overwatched, and whose beautiful youth he was now guiding with all the enthusiasm of a brother's noble love. With this si-ter, Louis had embarked in the ship of Captain Pierre; with her ne contemplated to share a sylvan home in the new Arcadia of his hopes; and with her he prayed that he might greet a long-lost sire, who, perchance, in his wilderness-exile, despaired of ever again beholding his children.

Beautiful, exceedingly, is prayer—if it be but the true prayer of the heart.

Such was that of the young girl, breathed in the solitude of an American forest, ere the foot of an Englishman had pressed the strand of Plymouth. The prayer was in the sweet French tongue. Its burden was:

" Marie, reine du ciel, priez pour nous!"

And the priest and the young man echoed the musical arison, saying:

"Mary, Queen of Heaven, pray for us!" She prayed with soft devotion—

"O ma mere, bien aimee!"

The old man, with white locks, and the youth, in low response, upraised their eyes, and murmured-

"Oh my mother, well-beloved!"
"Marie! priez pour nous!

Mary! pray for us!"

A solemn and beautiful litary was this, in the deep stilness of a summer's eve, upon a wild, New-England mountain
The shadows lengthened as the prayer proceeded, and gloon deepened around the worshipers. The holy eyes of the maiden Marie shone through the dimness, and her white hands, clasped in earnestness, gleamed from the shadows like the pinions of a snowy dove.

The three who knelt upon the sward were all who had escaped the final catastrophe of the wreck. Louis de Luzerne, in the last moments of terror succeeding the knowledge of Captain Pierre's desertion of the ship, had succeeded, by great exertions, in casting loose a small skiff, or rather canoe, which was fast to the dismantled quarter, and in this frail park had placed his sister, the priest Claude, and a youth of his own country, named Gabriel St. Elmo. At the dread naoment when the sea broke over and ingulfed the passengers, this little skirf, to which the four emigrants clung, was lifted from the quarter by a heavy swell, and flung high up among the breakers, whence a returning billow dragged it back to the wild turmoil of waters. Abbe Claude held the maiden in his arms, and Louis, with nervous hand, strove to guide the little boat with the broken blade of an oar which he had secured. But the youth St. Elmo, who had been with them when the wreck broke up, was now no longer visible. He had lost his hold upon the skiff, and been overwhelmed at once by the breakers. The boat itself, after tossing to and fro whirled in many directions, at last passed beyond a sheltering headland, where the embayed waters were calm, and there the wanderers remained till the gray dawn discovered to them their situation.

For many days and nights they pursued their route over hills and meadows, and through verdant vales, that were clethed with all the garniture of summer-time, and redolent with sweetest incenses of virgin nature. They journeyed very slowly, but still in the direction, as they believed, of their countrymen's settlement, called Acadid. With no chart or compass, save the rising and setting sun, to tell them of the east and west, and having many times to diverge from a straight course, in following the curves of rivers which they could not cross, they nevertheless pressed forward hopefully, with an unfaltering trust in Him who had thus far protacted them. Abbe Claude strengthened the courage of Louis by his pious faith and converse, and the youth, on his part, devoted every care to the tender one who clung to him by day and night. Many a mile did he walk, carrying Marie in his arms like an infant, and hushing her fears with brave assurances that all must yet be well; that at the French settiement they must speedily arrive, and there be folded to the heart of a long-lost parent.

So, day by day, they walked the wilderness, until, at length, one sultry eve, they gained the high slopes of Mount Wachusett, then towering, as it towers this day, over a wide horizon of green fields and waving woods and silvery streamlets, twining its base like ribbons. With but vague notions concerning the extent of that strange coast whereon they had been thrown so suddenly, the Abbe Claude believed that a few days' journey must conduct them to the settlements of the French.

The mountain they had now reached was the highest encountered in their journey thus far; and they had ascended nearly to its highest ledges, in the hope that from such an altitude the traces of civilized existence might welcome their vision. Of the Indian race they had seen no signs since leaving the sea-shore; and this fact had given them more assurance that their course was a proper one. Great, therefore, was the disappointment of all when, on climbing to a 'ty point of the wooded elevation, they could discern nothing in the extreme distance but interminable hills and hollows, covered with dense forest-growths like those which they had been traversing for so many weary days.

Marie, who had refused to complain of pain or weariness during the difficult ascent, here sunk entirely exhausted. She seemed about to yield under the hardships that had so severely taxed her gentle frame.

Louis bent down and pressed his lips to his sister's check. "Marie!" he said, "the good God watches over us! Let up put our trust in Him!"

"Yes!" answered Abbe Claude. "Let us have faith in Him who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb!"

"My brother!" murmured the young girl, "should I die, you will go to our father! Perhaps he-"

A tail, black shadow fell athwart the dusky twilight. Marie uttered a shriek of terror—shrinking back and then falling upon the greensward. A painted savage had stolen noiselessly from the thicket, and laid his tawny hand upon her arm. Louis sprung to his feet, drawing, as he did so, the sword which rested beside him. But, as if by consent, a fierce yell resounded through the forest-depths, and a line of yelling savages emerged from the gloom, brandishing pine-knot torches and weapons of murderous shape, while, with horrible cries, they danced in long circles, closing about their prey.

Louis saw, for the moment, only one object—his poor sister, prostrate upon the sward, motionless as in death. In another instant the brother's glance met the fierce regards of an Indian warrior, and simultaneously the two sprung to a renconter, in which the red-man's stone tomahawk was shivered by the young Frenchman's sword-blade, and his breast pierced by its point. But of what avail could be a single arm against such fearful odds? A dozen savages precipitated themselves upon the brave youth. A hundred threatening arms were uplifted to dispatch him.

Abbe Claude, raising his crucifix above his bare brow, knelt beside the swooning maiden, sustaining her slight form. It was a blessed unconsciousness that steeped the poor child's senses, shielding her from the sights and sounds around her;

for the wilderness appeared alive with formen, and an unearthly chorus of whoops and cries bespoke the jubilee of savage triumph.

Luzerne, struggling vainly against overpowering numbers, beheld his sword wrested from his grasp after a tomahawk blow had disabled his wrist. Defenseless and smitten to the ground, he submitted to be bound, as was the Abbe Claude, with tough withes of bark, while the still fainting Marie was lifted, a death-like burden, on the arm of a tall Indian who appeared to be the chief of the band.

Abbe Claude and Louis Luzerne were driven before their red captors down the dim forest-aisles, and, with bleeding fect and pinioned arms, urged onward swiftly by their Narragansett captors. Ah! what a dismal spectacle appalled them as they raised their burning eyes!—a ghastly line of trophies borne on bloody spear-points—dark, recking scalps, with the short hair of men, and long tresses, and blonde ringlets—the last vestiges of matrons and maids, whose corses lay unburied upon the rands of the shore. These sad relics were all that remained of their late companions in exi e—the hapless crew and passengers of the wrecked thip!

CHAPTER III.

THE WHITE MAN'S URIME.

On the same evening that Luzerne, his sister and the Abbe Claude ascended the mountain of Wachusett, and beheld the sun set from its summit, another scene of glory was visible some score of miles to the south. The declining sun was spreading a gauze of fire over the broad waters of Massachusetts Bay, and along the margin of her golden sands a myriad of rippling waves were breaking brightly and quietly, glittering in the western light like dissolving shells of pearl.

Beneath the spreading boughs of a stalwart oak, that stretched its ponderous arms toward the shore, sat a young Indian mother, while her child rocked in a birchen cradle that depended from a branch of the oak. She was weaving a chain of wampum, and crooning to herself, in a low-toned, musical voice, some plaintive ditty of her native tribe. At times her dark eyes fell, with a glance of love, upon her slumbering infant, and then, with a smile, were directed afar to the distant hill-tops, their glance following the course of a narrow hunting-path, which led from the sea-shore Urough the dense forest. By that path Outesle knew that her husband, a hrave Pequod hunter, would seek his cabin at the sunset hour, and her heart beat in glad anticipation; for the young mother was proud and fond of the father of her babe.

A boat appeared upon the waters of the bay, gradually approaching the land. Stealing onward, in the shadow of the high beach-rocks, it drew noiselessly nearer and nearer to the bank upon which the Indian mother sat. She saw it not, for the eyes and heart of Outesie were fixed upon the tall form of a man parting the leafy solitude. She knew it was her husband—a stately chieftain with plumed head and wampum-decked breast, returning from the chase. He held his bow in his hand, and rapidly descended the wooded hill, while the loving eyes of his wife eagerly watched his coming.

The and the second seco

The boat had now rounded the nearest point, and her kee. struck the sands of the shore. The Indian mother stood near the oak tree, her gaze fixed upon the advencing chieftain, and she heard not the approach of the strangers till a rough hand was laid upon her. Tarning quickly, she beheld two beings with white faces, and in singular garb, standing close beside her. At once all that she had heard concerning spirits of evil flighed over her mind. But she thought not of self-her first emotion was apprehension for her sleeping child. With a s'trick she darted to the oak tree, and snatched from its waving bough the birchen cradle in which her babe reposed.

The Pequod chieftain heard the shrick. His eyes fell upon the strangers who were pursuing her. No fear of evil spirits palsied the Indian's limbs, for he knew that the intruders were men of that pale race which, in other portions of the land, had already marked its advent with violence and blood, He fitted an arrow to his bow, and, bounding down the mountain-path, gained the oak tree, where his terrified wife had sunk insensible. The white men beheld the stalwart form of the Indian dashing toward them, and, turning quickly, they regained their boat, and pushed away from the beach.

The chieftain did not pursue them. His first care was to raise the fainting Outesie, and hush the terror of the babe, now awake, and uttering loud cries. Meanwhile the boat, which contained perhaps a dozen men, had reached the clear water at some distance from the shore, and there its crew, resting upon their oars, surveyed the movements of the redman.

Outesle's eyes soon opened beneath her husband's caresses, and she clung tremblingly to his bosom, as her gaze wandered shoreward and beheld the white spirits of her fear.

"Outesie-my wild bird-they are gone! It is I-it is Mattakan who embraces thee."

Outesic stretched forth her arms for her child, and, pressing it to her heart, soothed its plaintive cries. The twilight was now falling, and Mattakan and his wife had several miles to walk to their own lodge, for the oak tree was but a trystingplace where Outesie was wont to meet her chieftain, as he returned, laden with small game, from the forest-hunt. At the present time, Mattakan's belt of wampum held several birds and rubbits, pierced by his unerring shaft

Euddenly, however, as the chieftain turned to enter, with Outesie, the ferest-depths, and give the alarm to the village that strangers were upon their waters, a loud report, that sounded in the Indian's ears like thunder, caused him to turn his head. At the same moment a bullet whistled past, and, striking the oak tree, splintered the bark in fragments at his feet. Mattakan, appalled at the strange power which had performed this feat, stood for a moment silently clasping the hand of Outesie, then hurriedly led her toward the forest-path. Another moment, and his form would be lost in the shadows of the great trees. Outesie, with heating heart, folded her babe in her arms and followed her husband.

Again that loud report startled the echoes. It was minuted with the dying shrick of Outesie! A bullet from the white man's musket had pierced her loving heart. She staggered forward and fell at the roots of the reverent oak which had been her place of tryst, the babe still clasped to her heart.

9

d

y

0

N

V,

d-

39, ed

15 ng

83

to 1:5+

116

At

ra

Mattakan knelt beside his wife; he saw the life-stream welling from the cruel wound in her bosom; he met her soft eyes, upturned to his own, in a long, last look of affection; and then, as she sunk upon the sward, Mattakan knew that Outesie was no more. The leaden death of the pale strangers had robbed him of his beloved.

Fury filled the soul of the Pequod chief. Ruising a wild peal of the war-whoop, he rushed to the water's edge, and, fitting an arrow to his bow, launched it at the retreating boat. The shaft fell short of its mark, and a shrill laugh of triumphal scorn came from the white men. A discharge of muskets hurled a dozen bullets around the chieftain's form; but he heeded them not, though the plume was struck from his sculp-lock, and his wampum-necklace was cut in twain by the missiles. Why should Mattakan now fear death? His heart was with the dead Outesie.

white man's boat glided away on the misty waters of the bay. And when the last rays of day had fled from the scene, and the night shades drew heavily around, Mattakan stood beside a grave that he had scooped out in the sand beneath the oak tree.

Is that grave the Pequod chieftain buried the body of his beloved Outesie. But first he knelt upon the sand beside his lost one, and, severing a tress of her long, black hair, placed it in his bosom, murmuring a few low words. The tress was wet with the blood of his murdered wife, and the words which Mattakan breathed were a vow of vengeance upon the pale-faces.

Wrapping the young child in a garment of its slain mother, he pressed it to his heaving heart, and then departed into the wilderness.

Many moons passed away, but Mattakan was seen no more upon the shores of the Massachusetts, and his voice resounded not in the wigwams of his tribe. Mattakan hunted no more upon the three hills of Shawmut.

The small mound, beneath the ancient oak that marked the grave of Outesie, began to crumble before the encroaching waves, and soon the waters encircled the oak itself.

But Mattakan came not, and none among his nation knew whither he had wandered.

CHAPTER IV.

THE NARRAGANSETT TRIJMPH.

UVER the green hillsides, through deep woods and across swollen rivers, journeyed a long line of dusky savages, each treading in the footsteps of the one who preceded him, as they tracked their way toward the declining sun. They were all hideously painted, and ornamented with the grotesque trappings of aboriginal vanity. Feathers, shells, and strings of wampum, mingled with the skins of snakes and teeth of wolves, were hung about their necks and bosoms, and, in addition to these customary decorations, many wore trinkets of copper, and silver and golden crosses. It was evident, indeed, that they were returning home with the trophies of some recent victory; for, scattered among their under accouterments, were torn and blood-stained articles of European clothing, fabrics of costly texture, fragments of gilded wood, and finely-wrought drinking-vessels, which clinked together as the short, quick trot of the savages shook them .rom side to side.

The red-men were merry; for strange sights had they witnessed, and great triumphs won. They had met the white strangers from beyond the waters, and beheld his "big cance" shattered by the terrible breath of Hobbomocko, and seen how its great ribs were broken upon the rocks of the seaside. They had smitten the pale-faces, as they gained the shore, and mad: their hands red with the blood of the white strangers. And now they journeyed homeward with great joy, for many scalps of young and old danced before the eyes of the Narragansett warriors. Envious would be the tribes of the Massachusetts, when news of the bold deeds of the Narragansetts should reach their ears, as they sat amid the squaws in their wigwams.

The war-party pursued its march, till at length the village of the tribe was neared, and the Narragansett hunting grounds stretched before the gaze of their returning owners. Whooping and yelling, the savage warriors quickened their pace, and tossed in the air the bloody poles on which were stretched a hundred gory scalps. And forth from the lodges and wigwarns, to greet them, came the old men, and squaws, and children, leaping willly about, and screeching, like demons, a welcome to their victorious friends. O, it was a horrible and unearthly scene to look upon—that demoniac welcome home! for distorted figures, naked and frightfully painted, danced beneath the old forest-trees, in the light of bluzing pinc-knots, which they whirled above their heads, and a choras of terrific cries mingled with the beat of wooden drums and blast of conch-shells, frightening the wild beasts to their lairs by the more intense wildness of savage men. It was a joyous welcome, indeed, to the returning warriors, but a fearful greeting to their wretched captives, who, tattered, scourged, and fettered, marched in the midst of the whooping hand. There were two prisoners -one youthful and fair, with delicate limbs, new, alas, all bleeding and bruised from blows and the hardships of travel; the other, with white locks and reverend brow, alike bruise I and wearied, but pressing bravely onward, his shackled hands folded meekly on his breast.

Vainly had Louis de Luzerne struggied for freedom-vainly prayed for death; the goading spears of his cruel captors arged him forward on the tollsome march, though his pinioned limbs had grown stiff with pain and fatigue. The aged priest, like himself, was half bowed to the ground under a load of trophies, which the Indians had compelled them to bear; still, the good Abbe, forgetful of self, whispered words of consoation in the young man's ear.

"Courage, my son!" whispered the old priest. thy sweet sister, may still be saved, like ourselves."

"Alas! her scalp may even now dangle amid those which you savages toss about, like demons that they are. Better for Marie, truly if she indeed perished on the mountain!"

"She would then rest where the wicked might not trouble," responded the priest. "Nevertheless, the Almighty may have preserved her, my son, and as Christian men, it is meet that we give not way to despair!"

"Would that I were lying beside my sister!" cried Louiz, refusing to be consoled by the good Abbe's words. "Would," he continued, more bitterly, "that these heathen savages were done with their mummery, that they might be speedy in their macrifice of which we are to be the victims!"

d

d

8

d

d

0

3

t-

9

9,

)ľ

"Nay, tempt not Heaven with impious wishes! We indeed suffer, but One has suffered before us. Trust in that One, my son—even Him in whom the young Marie trusted."

The youth did not reply, for a whisper, low and sweet as the summer wind, seemed to echo the priest's words. The memory of his sister's voice descended like dew upon his bruised heart, and he felt that, if the maiden was indeed no more of earth, her spirit would be near him in the hour of trial. He bent his head and went silently on.

The unearthly scene—the horrible faces of the Indians, and their terrific gestures, seeming to menace death to the captives at every contortion of the dance—began to swim indistinctly before the eyes of Abbe Claude and his young countryman Soon it seemed that only a confused whirl of dusky figures gleaming torches, and upheld spears and hatchets, danced before them, and then they heard but a din of yells and horrid laughter, mingled with dull tomahawk-strokes upon the post to which they were fastened. Then, as the savage triumph grew wader and wilder, Heaven vouchsafed relief to the wre-ched prisoners. Fear exhaustion and suffering paralyzed their senses. Their eyes closed, and they became unconvicted of torture.

CHAPTER V.

ROBIN BALL.

that luckless shot ere we be clear of these heathen savages, said the voice of a man who held the ruller of a large boat which, filled with his companions, was skirting the jutting points of a long reach of rocks forming the entrance of what is now the Mystic river.

"And I doubt, Robin Ball, you will one day provoke me to send as luckless a shot into that English pate of yours," replied Captain Pierre.

"A luckless shot, and a luckless hand, and a luckless soul, will be that which shall seek harm to Robin Ball, and he live to know the same!" retorted the Englishman. "Nathless, I will say, what I said before, that it was a coward act to shoot that young squaw out of rank wantonness! What need was there to waste powder at all, Captain Pierre."

"Have care, Robin Ball, of your speech, else there will be more than words between us. What think ye if I leave we ashore among your good friends, the red-men? By my faith, it were fair wages for mutinous grumbling wherewith yo would breed evil blood among comrades."

"Call my speech what ye may, Captain Pierre, there shall not be wanting a hand to back what the mouth utters."

"Dog! do you threaten me?" cried the Creole, starting from his seat in the middle of the vessel, and half raising his sword, as he leaned toward the boat-steerer. "Another word from that mutinous throat, and there'll be one less of this good company."

"Say you so, Captain Pierre?" retorted the Englishman, letting go his hold of the rudder, and grasping instead the barrel of an arquebus, which lay beside him at the stern of the boat. "If Rob Ball be a dog, he is no dog of a Creels buceaueer. What, ho, my masters i" continued the seaman, glancing from one to another of his comrades in the pinnace: "Will ye see your messmate tossed overboard to the sharks, because he doubts the good policy of murdering squaws, when we have thousands of bloody savages tracking us night and day since the shipwreck?"

18

at 15

at

to ď, ve

ot

as 90

FO

14

18

li

15 is rd

is.

n,

18

of

18

The seaman's appeal was not without its effect, for a murmur ran from one to another of the crew, and Captain Pierre's uplifted arm dropped irresolute by his side. Thei Creole, however, was not a man to be easily alarmed. He knew well the natures of those who composed the greater portion of the company, since it was true that several of them had sailed with him in former years in quest of adventures quite as perilous as the present one. On the other hand, he was aware that the English sailor, Rob Ball, was a fellow of address and boldness, and possessed not a little influence over many of the crew. Beside this, the unfortunate termination of the voyage had disheartened most of the men, who had heretofore not been backward in expressing themselves in terms of insubordination quite as positive as those of the Englishman. Captain Pierre, therefore, saw that his better policy was to temporize.

"Come, come, Robin Ball," he said, releasing his clasp of the sword-hill, and stretching out his hand to the boat-steerer "Let the past be forgotten between worthy comrades! If the squaw had held her peace, no harm had been done. As it was, comrade, I sought not to slay the woman—it was the red dog I aimed at."

Robin Ball doggedly took the hand which was extended to him, but he gave it no grasp of reconciliation.

"It was a coward shot, I'll maintain!" he muttered.

Captain Pierre overheard the remark, and bit his lip, while the dark blood mounted to his face. Nevertheless, he only laughed, displaying his white teeth, and said:

Well, worthy Rob, the next shot shall be yours! But, look ye, comrades—the smooth beach and quiet cove of you little isle will give us a snug harbor for the night. I like not skirting these thickets in the full glare of the moon. And, see! the wench is just peeping from behind those tall trees! Presently her beams will light up the waters, so test we shall be quite too fair a target for the arrows of red marksmen! Prythee, good Robin, point the boat shoreward, an' it please you!"

But Robin Bull's temper seemed to be fur from placable or U.is occasion. He gloomily held his peace, and though, as directed, he steered the pinnace into shoal-water, and gained the nurrow cove, beyond which a patch of hard beach, glittering in the rays of mooelight which now began to glimmer through the forest-leaves, offered a secure landing-place, it was evilent that no gentle feeling warmed his heart with reference to his commander. Of this, however, the Creole apparently took no note, waiting quietly in his place till the boat's keel struck the sands, and then springing ashore with the rest of the crew, seemingly losing all recollection of the late war of words. Robin Ball muttered a few grumbling words, as he sided in dragging the boat upon the beach, and securing it for the night, and then joined his companions in disposing of his allotted share of the scanty remnant of provisions which they had saved from the wreck, but to which had been added an abundant store of succulent Indian corn, gleaned from an Indian plantation encountered on their devious voyage in the pinnace.

V

a

e:

el

h

re

a

o!

st

111

th

gi

GI

di:

m:

N

the

Wi

dre

of

13

Captain Pierre was well versed in savage craft, for he had dwelt in the Havana, and among the islands of the Spanish main, and, withal, was a politic and fearless a lventurer, who made light of dangers and adversities which might have gone far to dishearten one of weaker mould. Under his skill ful pilotage, by rowing in the shadow of the banks, and keeping watchful eye both for canoes upon the bay and savage lodge-smokes on the land, the band which he led had for & week navigated the mouths of various harbors, and even ventured far along the banks of rivers that manifestly penetrated the far interior of the land. It was not, indeed, till the mentioned evening that the Creole, on discovering, as he thought, a solitary squaw reclining near the beach, conceived the wicked project of obtaining possession of the defenseless creature, and thus gaining information concerning the red ribes who dwelt on the shores of the Massichusetts. Other and cruel purpose had Captain Pierre, which he as yet amparted to but two or three of his followers, and this was to oblige his prisoner to conduct the band to some village of the red people, which he proposed surprising in the night, and making captures of a goodly number of children. These prizes secured, and the pinnace safely steered from the bay, the Creole thought that little difficulty would be experienced in coasting the land southward to Havana, where his captives could be problably disposed of as slaves to the planters in that sland. It was a nefarious design, but one quite in kesping with the character of the buceaneer, and not, indeed, at variance with the customs of the time, inasmuch as other adventurers, English as well as Spanish and French, had amassed large fortunes by the same traffic.

Pierre Dacot, therefore, or Captain Pierre, as he was called, found no difficulty in reconciling his conscience to the deed thus contemplated; and, though foiled in his attempt to abduct the Pequod woman, by the sudden appearance of her husband, whom the rover feared might be accompanied by other savages, he determined, at the earliest opportunity, to carry into execution his project of kidnapping. The pinnace was large enough to accommodate, beside his crew, some dozen or more close-pinioned children, and, by these latter, Captain Pierre hoped to realize a few hard pieces of gold as soon as he should reach the Hayana.

It was necessary that all his companions should be made acquainted with the enterprise proposed. He knew the obstinate disposition of Robin Ball, and likewise that this stolid fellow had been much disaffected since their abandonment of the emigrants; and yet it was of the first importance that Rob, who was much regarded among the men, should give his earnest co-operation to the business of kidnapping, in order to insure its success. The Creole regretted bitterly the dispute which had occurred between himself and the Englishman, and resolved to heal the breach as speedily as possible. No sooner, then, was the pinnace secured for the mean dispersed under the lady covert of the sand island where they had sought a sheltered repose, than the captair drew near to Robin Ball, and said, in a coaxing voice:

"Comrade! if I spake word of offense, or if the rash deciof the enemy has stirred up bitterness between us, it is not meet that comrades in danger she ild harbor malice. Here,

2

d

19

P

C

then, Robin, is my hand, and let us be friends once more, for I love you too well to sleep in anger with you."

116

he 83

of

m

8

88

00

8:1

fis

be

Ci

H

be fir

Pi

W A

thi

pla

011

Pa

his lis

811 sta

In

E .

The English seaman held the rover's hand a moment, without speaking, though he returned the pressure which it gave his own. Then he said slowly—"Captain Pierre, there be many natures and many paths in the world. Your nature, I doubt, is not my nature; and when this voyage is over, our paths will very like be wide from each other. But as you say, comrades in danger should harbor no malice. Therefore let us be no more at strife till we meet in Christian land."

"With all my heart, brave comrade," said the captain.

"And if, when we are safe among Christian men once more, Robin Ball shall show cause of grievance against Pierre Dacot, by my troth, I shall be ready to settle the score, with sword dagger, or pistol, as the case may be."

Rob Ball appeared greatly mollified by this promise on the part of the leader, and shook the latter's hand with earnestness, as he replied: "That's fair and frank, and beshrew me but Robin will give Pierre whatever satisfaction he may claim—as my hand on the bargain now warrants. So good night, captain!"

Saying this, Rob Bull was about to east himself on the soft, grass, where he had already made a pillow of leaves, covered with his thick sailor's gabardine, but Captain Pierre had not yet finished the conversation to his liking.

"We have had the fiend's own lack in this voyage," he cried, seating himself beside the sailor. "Look you at me, comrade—stripped of all I possessed by the wreck, and obliged to begin the world without a maravedi. Now, if some stroke of fortune were to offer—if we could but get away from this savage land, and fall in with some rich galleon that a few stout blows might master—"

"Mass! but it would be better than shooting squaws for marksmanship," said Rob Ball. "Faith, Captain Pierre! I value my life as highly as any man's—but if a good Spanish merchantman were to be had by the risk of it, never fear to find Robin lagging in the background."

"I doubt you not, Robin, I doubt you not," answered the Creole. "But, we are not yet at the Havana, and when the Havana is reached, it is many a league to Tortugas' Isle, and further still to the Osoonoco, and the Spanish main."

"Good-by, then, to Spanish galleons!" said Rob Ball, moodily.

"Not so!" answered the crafty Creole. "Have you not heard, Rob, of your bold countryman, Walter Raleigh, who sailed the great main, and went in search of the Golden People of Guiana?"

"Ay, marry have I," cried Rob, "and of Drake, the good mariner, who took great store of wealth from the Den Spaniards."

1

0

6

9

b

"Well, there be Drakes and Raleighs now on the main," said Captain Pierre; "there be bold mariners who go out in boats not bigger than our pinnace here, and with no arms save pistols and cutlasses; and the great galleons strike their flags when they see them, and the Dons fall on their marrow-bones, begging for quarter."

"By my troth!" exclaimed Robin Ball, warmed up by the Creole's words, "say you that such bold freebooters be there? Here is my hand, then, thrice, Captain Pierre. Let bygones be bygones, and go we speedily to the brave Spanish main!"

"Oh, we are not yet there," sighed the rover. "We must first reach the Havana!"

"But the pinnace will weather her way thither, Captain Pierre. Have you not promised us that?"

"And that we shall reach the Havana, I doubt not; but what think ye, comrade, will be our luck among the Havana planters, save, indeed, we have gold wherewith to provide for our voyage to the main? Now, I have a thought; Robin Pall—"

The captain paused, apparently revolving some new idea in his mind, while the Englishman half rose from his pillow to listen.

"If we can manage to catch a few of these wild natives, and transport them safely to the Havana, the red hides would stand us some broad pistoles, Robin Bell."

The seaman's blue eyes opened widely.

"What say you, Captain Pierre-mean you to sell the Indians?"

"In good sooth I do. The heathen dogs-more especially if they be likely youth of fifteen years or thereabout-will bring a good price with the planters—some fifty pistoles per head, or thereabouts, Robin Ball."

"And you will sell the flesh and blood of the poor people, captain?"

"For fifty pistoles per head-male and female, Robin!"

"Then may God's malison light on ye!" cried the Englishman, suddenly starting up, and confronting his astonished leader, who had deemed his crafty words were listened to with career ears. "Am I a Turk, Captain Pierre, that ye propose this foul traffic to me? Out with ye, for a coward and a kidnapper!"

"Robin Ball, have a care!"

"Villain that ye are, and no brave mariner—I defy you, and if my life be spared till the morrow's sun, I take my leave of your company, come what may come."

Captain Pierre's small black eyes twinkled with malice, but he made no reply to the Englishman, who threw himself back upon his pillow, with a muttered malediction. After a pause, however, the Creole glided silently away from the spot where however, the Creole glided silently away from the spot where the conversation had been held, and proceeded noiselessly toward the pinnace, in whose bows watched two others of the

DESIGNATION OF A

in ha her wa

Con

ejie

terr

consiste con

the g

enen For chang with chao her a accust

forwar Mar reache footste bow as

CHAPTER VI.

TIBQUONTAM AND MONOMA.

ears of Marie, and before her eyes stood the tall figure of a zed-man, his features grim with paint, his wild eyes gleaming in the light of torches, and a deadly weapon upraised in his hand, it was no wonder that the senses of the maiden formok her, or that all consciousness of what afterward took place was lost to her vision. The dreadful attack, the struggle, the capture of her brother and the Abbe Claude, were mercifully concealed from the apprehension of the young girl, and when she awoke to observation once more, the scene and all its terrors had vanished.

Marie was no longer on the mountain's summit, no longer companioned by her beloved Louis and the priest, but, instead, she felt herself compressed by the strong arms of a plumed Indian, who bore her rapidly through the dense forest, descending the declivities with the agility of a deer, and treading the greensward with a step springy and light, as if no burden encumbered his progress.

For some moments after awaking to a realization of the change which had taken place in her situation, Marie could with difficulty reflect—all her intellect appeared confused and chaotic. Strangeness and uncertainty seemed to encompass her as with a cloud. Gradually, however, her brain grow accustomed to the rapid motion with which she was hang forward, and her thoughts began to shape themselves.

Marie felt that she was unbound, and that no wound half reached her, moreover, that her captor was alone—no other footsteps following his own. He sustained her slight form very easily with one stalwart arm, while the other bore his bow and heavy war-club. Marie noted all this, and, at the same time, became aware that her head was pillowed upon the red-man's shoulder, her cheek pressed against his glowing neck. She started suddenly, and shrunk instinctively from the contact.

The Indian's coal-black eye, revealed in the moonlight, seemed to flash to the maiden's soul, as its quick glance was turned upon her, recognizing her awakening. But, save sehort guttural expression, apparently of satisfaction, he gave be other token of intelligence, but bounded onward with the saus clastic step. Thus onward through the forest and over grassy hills, resplendent in the moonbeams, and through dim gorges, cloven amid the rocks, until, at length, they reached the margin of a quietly-flowing river, whose banks were clothed with laurel, and sumach, and yellow-petaled filies, waving in the soft night-breeze.

Here the red-man laid his living burden upon the sward, tenderly as a mother places her child to rest, and then, parting the bushes that grew by the water, disclosed a light canoe of birch-bark, which he drew to the bank. In the stern of this frail bark he first deposited his bow, arrows and war-club, and then, lifting once more the trembling form of his captive, disposed her gently in the bow of the vessel, balancing it the while so nicely, that even when his own heavy frame followed, and reached its place in the middle of the craft, no motion took place save a rapid gliding forth, straight as an arrow's flight, upon the river's bosom. Imperceptibly, as it were, the canoe seemed to strike the current, and, propelled by a light paddle which the red-man wielded, shot with great velocity down the moonlit tide.

t

tl

b

8

in ra

OU

In

m

or

th

BLI

ba

Sad and painful were the images which poor Marie conjured to her fancy, as she reclined at her captor's feet in the canoe, and beheld the dim river-banks, evermore changing, as the birchen vessel glided swiftly past them.

Many hours, it seemed, clapsed ere the canoe was checked by a stroke of the Inlian's powerful arm, and its prow directed to the shore. Here, with the same deliberation with which he had embarked, the savage drew the little bark ashore, and first taking from it his arms, lifted his captive to his stalwart shoulder, and bounded away into the dark forest with unrelaxed speed. Presently, however, he reached what eppeared the termination of the night's journey, and the cyes of Marie opened upon a novel and beautiful scene.

vale between two wooded hills, from each of which descended a small stream of water, at first gurgling musically over a pebbly bed, and then hapsing into a centle and noiseless flow, between banks of soft grass fringed with lilies, and fragrant with wild honeysuckle and sweet fern. The two streams met, and, mingling with each other, parted again to clide on either side of a small, oval islet, and then flow afterward in a browier channel from the plain into the deep wood, where their course was lost evermore from view. But it was the little islet that most attracted the attention of Marie.

Upon it was a hut or wigwam, constructed after the ruda Indian fashion, but not repulsive or naked-looking, fike most of the aboriginal habitations. It was built between the massy trunks of two sycamore-trees, patriarchs of the forest, whose immense branches rose high above the roof which they sheltered. The top was arched, either by accident or design, and with the curved boughs above it, suggested somewhat of a civilized effect. Over roof-tree and sides, likewise, and around the door-posts, and on either wall, grew thick elambering flowers, honeysuckles, wild edantine, and russet woodbines. Altogether, the wigwam, or cottage it might be called, presented an appearance sufficiently remarkable and attractive to divert for a space the thoughts of Marie, so that she forgot the affliction of herself and friends in wonder at the beauty of the scene around her

The Indian placed her upon a moss-covered stone, washed by the stream that puried beside it, and there leaving her for a moment, with a light bound he crossed the water and stood in front of the wigwam. A dog barking loudly, immediately ran from the open door, and the next instant a woman glided out into the moonlight, and, durting forward, fell into the Indian's outstretched arms, her own hands clasping his bending neck. The dog, meantime, a creature of the small Indian breed, leaped to and fro, and sprung upon the savage, and then, running to the streamlet's edge, barked sharply at the strange figure which his quick eyes saw upon the opposite bank.

h

k

0

31

The maiden witnessed this apparently joyful meeting with emotions of sorrow and sympathy-sorrow as she thought of her own describe state, and sympathy with the affection which was memested in the actions of the wild beings before her. At the same time it seemed to her that the embraces which sta benefit were a quaranty for her own future security—as T they assured a gentle treatment to even a captive and an eremy. And yet to whom was the deligate girl an enemy?sic whose infiney and chillhood hiel been passe! among a-sociations the most peaceful and love in piring, whose childlood had been untured by the deep affection of an only brother, and spent in the seclusion of claistered walls! True, the young cirl had scarcely known a mother's love ere it was List to her forever in this world; but well she remembered the beautiful face, with its sad smile, that often bent over her infinit sumbers, and the sweet voice that was wont to soothe her with the dear name of " categliter." Another countenance she half recalled, that of a majestic man, with clear, brown eves and noble forchead, whom her leart told her was her father, but who, alas, had known as little of his child as did his wife; for the cumity of a nobleman, powerful at court, had drawn upon the elder Luzerne the unjust anger of the king, and he had been torn from his wife and children, in the latter's earliest years, and expatriated to the then dreaded clime of America. His lady did not long survive him, but departed from her lonesome state of widowel love, and left her two babes to the care of a good man, her only counselor, the Abbe Claude-him who, to the last, had followed and watched over his precious charge. Such was Marie's trief history, and it floring through her mind even in that moment, during which her glance restel upon the Indian and his companion. She had little time for reflection ere the savage was once more at 1 or side, lifting her in his arms preparatory to recrossing the greenlt. Memtime, the Indian women had ignited a torch, and its bright light streamed through the woven branches of trees and strips of birch-bark which formed the sides of the hat, into which the white mailen was presently carried, and praced upon a couch of soft furs that occupied a corner. Here, in the light of the terch, she had opportunity to examine closely the appearance of the two, whose singular attentions began to inspire her with wonder, if not with fear.

L

f

n

r

a

d

8

M

0

0

H

th

d te

th

th

Sy

Fe.

The Indian, in whose arms she had been borne so many miles, was a man of heavy frame, broad-chested, and erect as a mountain-pine. His arms and breast were decorated with painted figures and ornaments, and rows of wamp on-string hung about his neck, donoting that he was a chill of reals. Buskins of deer-skin defended his feet and legs, and a fende of some fibrous material, stained with various colors, and sewn with wampum, depended from his waist, over which usually was worn the blanket with which he had covered Marie, and which he now held in his ten I. The chieftain's forehead was broad and high, though disfigured by a streak of crimson paint, blotches of which likewise strined his cheeks. Above the foreheal the heal was bare, save where a tuit of black hair was gathered at the top of the skull, and bound with wampum, out of which rose a bunch of eagle's feathers. To the eyes of Marie, the chief appeared to be a man of forty years or more, though in his mien and eyes were apparent all the vigor and spirit of youth.

The Indian girl-for it was evident that scarcely sixteen summers had passed over the head of her who stood beside the chief, and whom the French maiden at once divined to be his daughter-was of slight but graceful figure, with regular features, dark, dreamy-looking eyes, and hair of intense blackness, hanging nearly to her feet. She was clothed in a light robe or tunic, weven of threads of bark, broidered with beads, and knit together by shiny rows of shell, while a mantle of delicate offer-skins was confined to one shoulder, hanging gracefully to her knees. Her small feet were covered by little moccasins of birch-bark, gayly spangled with shells and bits of glittering grass. She stood beside her father in an attitude of native grace, her form drawn up like his, and her arching neck thrown back with the air of a princess. Nevertheless, though proud in look and mien, the Inlian girl's eyes were dwelling upon the pale-faced captive with an expression of tender commiseration, which at once assured Marie that in the Indian's child she had found a friend.

0

f

0

d

r.

8

Perhaps, so thought the chieftain himself; for, as he followed the look of his daughter, it seemed as if his grim brow relaxed, and something akin to a smile lingered upon his lip. The sed maiden caught his eye; the next moment she advanced tenderly between the palms of her hands, and imprinted a lass upon her forehead. Marie's heart grew full in a moment. She forgot that her companion was a strange maid, that she was a heathen and of a savage race. She only felt that warm kiss upon her forchead, and saw two tender eyes gazing into her own with a look of sympathy which won her confidence. Marie solbed aloud, and, throwing herself upon the neck of the Indian girl, burst into a flood of tears.

The stoical red chieftain raised his hand to his forchead, brushing it hastily across his eyes. Then, striding to the door, he stooped his plumed head, and stood forth beneath the moonlight.

"Ugh!" ejaculated the Indian, as his dark eyes cast a backward glauce upon the two maidens; "Ugh! the warrioz feel woman his heart!"

And he struck his bread breast heavily with his hand, as if to recall his manhood.

CHAPTER VII.

THE RATTLESNAKE.

1

17

It was early day when the Abbe Claude awoke from a lethargy into which, together with his young fellow-prisoner, he had fallen during the war-dance of the savages, on their return to their village. It was with great difficulty that he could recall to memory the incidents of the preceding night. A recollection of some frightful scene, indeed, was dimly present to his mind, but it was rather like the vagueness of a half-remembered dream than the reminiscences of a fearful reality. Gradually, however, as his eyes became accustomed to the place in which he found himself, so the shadowy events of the Indian feast grew vivid to his mind's vision. Again he listened to monotonous war-chants, sudden yells, horrid laughter—again he heard the sharp whiz of a hatchet through the air, and its dull stroke into the wood beside his cheek.

The Abbe strained his gaze until it was able to discern something of the place in which he was. His limbs were stil. bound, though not with that benumbing tightness which had cramped them during his weary march to the Indian village. He could slightly move his hand, and distinguish, beneath its touch, the soft wolfskin on which he lay. He soon ascertained, from the noise of regular breathing around Ling that there were other persons near, evidently wrapped in profound siumber, and he therefore concluded that he was confined in one of the wigwams or lodges of the red-men, in the midst of guards as was customary with the Indians to bestow their prisoners. But the uppermost thought of the good Abbe concerned less himself than his friend and charge, Louis. Anxi us to discover if the young man was in his neighborboo? he raised himself cautiously, as far as his thongs would I and cast a scrutinizing glance about him.

A swart savage, holding in his sleeping grasp a huge ware club, lay close beside the priest, while a dozen more, all apparently slambering soundly, were dispersed over the wigwam floor; but the Abbe's gaze fell first upon the form of Louis, encompassed by the brawny arms of a Herculean Indian. He breathed a silent prayer of gratitude, as he saw that his youthful friend was sleeping as quietly on the broad breast of his guard as if suffering and captivity were things unknown to his experience.

Upon a log, at the wigwam-entrance, reclined a gigantic warrior, with his weapon—a knotted, jugged, but beautifully polished maple club—grasped in his sinewy fingers. As the increasing light, falling between the branches of a forest-tree above, played over the red-man's features, the prisoner was struck at once with their solemn and devout expression. The copper brow seemed gilled with the morning beams, and a strange seriousness, as of awed thoughts, invested the savage face with a quiet gran loar which drew the admiration of the

"Perhaps the Indian prays! and doubtless his prayers—even his untutore! prayers—are accepted of the Lord!"

Again Abbe Claude turned his head toward the spot where Louis slept in the arms of his guard; but a thrill of deadly terror crept through his frame; be gasped for breath as his glance rested on the young min. Erect, at the very head of young Luzerne, its scaly body glistening in the dull morning light, the priest beheld the wriggling folds of a large serpent. Its malignant eyes, like sparks of fire, twinkled close to the captive's cheek, and its forked tongue played around his force head.

The lodge was silent, save the measured breathing of the unconscious savages. The priest alone, palsied with unutterable herror, beheld the writhing snake. A moment the venomous reptile stretched its length beside the captive; then it reared itself, with crested head, once more, and threw back its fanged month, as if to strike its victim. He vented his stifled feelings in a cry of terror.

Immediately, and indeed before the Abbe's cry had ceased, the sleeping Indians were upon their feet, clutching their weapons, while a succession of short yells rung alarm through all the village. The reclining warrior, at the lodge-toor, sprung up, brandishing his club, and a crowd of braves and screeching spruws poured into the wigwam. They beheld Father Chaude half riving from the ground to which he was fastened by wooden stakes driven through his though and pointing with outstretched arm toward his fellow-captive, who lay gasping upon the earth. The serpent, gliding to a corner of the hut, reared its crest again. It was but the work of a moment, however, for a stout brave to hard his club at the angry reptile. It fell, crushed and dying, upon the ground, and the Indian's moceasined foot bruised its head.

y

Å

9

A gentle-featured Indian woman run from among the squaws, and, kneeling beside the young captive, lifted his drooping forehead from the mut on which he had fallen from the arms of his guard. Louis struggled for breath, as though overcome with pain or fright, and the woman, buring his arm, disclosed upon the shoulder a few drops of blood. The snake had struck its victim surely, and its poison was in the wound. This sad fact was attested to the senses of Abbe Claude by the sudden guttural exclamation that run from one to another of the savige spectators. The priest strove to crawl toward his friend, but the strong hand of one of his guards restrained him, and a short "ugh!" imposed silence.

It became evident at once to the Abbe that his fellow-prisoner was not to be left without immediate aid. The squaw who had raised the youth, and discovered the hurt, now tore away the covering of the captive's neck, and, stooping beside him, applied her lips to the venomous bite inflicted by the rattlesnake's fangs. At the same time an old savage, who stood by, placked some grass that grew near the ledge-door and, placing it in his month, began slowly to chew, while he woman sucked at the youth's arm. Abbe Churle grass wonderingly at the coolness and silence of the Indiana for from any of the party, save the gratteral much?' of the grants

8

9

1.

19

F

Z

113

ed,

eiz

m,

the Abbe intently watched the squaw, as sho knott beside his youthful countryman, her lips glued, as it were, to his wound At length, withdrawing her mouth, the woman turned toward the old savage who had been chewing the weeds, and, receiving from him the masticated pulp, placed it upon the shoulder of Louis, covering the inflamed spot where the snake's teeth had entered. Then, winding thin slivers of ash about the arm, and binding a ban lage of bark tightly over all, the squaw cencluded her rude surgery; after which, obedient to some directions which she gave, two Indians, lifting the wounded captive, bore him in their arms from the large wigwain.

Abbe Claude essayed once more to rise, but the savage nearest him touched his tomahawk significantly, and motioned him to lie quiet. Then the guard took his seat beside the lodge-entrance, and the other warriors, together with the squaws, retired silently from the hut.

Morning wore on, and the many sounds peculiar to an Indian village began to be heard. Dogs passed the lodge with a short, quick bark; fowls screamed; the noise of stones with which the squaws were grinding their corn mingled with the sound of wooden drums and conch-shells, making a not unpleasing dissonance to the ear. The guard at the wigwamentrance leisurely filled his stone-pipe, and presently a powerful odor of the tobacco-weed filled the lodge. Insensibly, the Abbe sunk into a feverish sleep.

When he awoke, it was near midlay, and another savage smoked at the hut-door. The new guard offered his prisoner food, of which the priest ate ravenously; for long abstinence, and the exhausting excitement that preceded his sleep, had made him like a child in weakness. The savage juilor smiled grimly as he beheld the old man devour the savory succotash, and then, unbinding his though, he motioned him to rise. Abbe Chaude obeyed with didliculty, for the withes had cramped his limbs while he slept; but, summoning all his strength, he followed the stately form of his Indian conductor out of the wigwam, and through the monotonous bustle of an aboriginal town.

A singular scene was presented to the European's eyes Salvert savages by dispersed in various attitudes, in front of their bats, or upon the green carpet of soft grass, lazily recumbent, and surveying each other in dreamy indolence, while groups of old men, youths and squaws were scattered here and there, eagerly listening to young braves, recounting tales of their maiden achievements in the late expedition. Square of stone were smoking near some of the lodges, at which squaws were preparing food; and steaming haunches of wild deer, and huge joints of moose-meat, hun, from the boughts of trees, attesting the great specess of the hunters who occupied the wigwams nearest to them. Lean, stanted dogs were running to and fro, sporting with the maked papooses who rolled on the grass, or, strapped to hourds, were placed upright against the gnarled foot of oak trees; and bracks of trechins, with tiny bows and blanted arrows, were performing minic battles, or harling light tom drawks at targets with wonderful dexterity and precision.

The Abbe's guide strode toward a spot of elevated ground, where a group of young men and women were dancing and singing, recalling to the captive's memory the scene of the preceding night. A monotonous chant spanded from their midst, and, high above their heads, they tossed weapons and hoops wreathed with evergreen, yelling and leaping, the while, in confused chorus. Father Cloude shuldered, for he remembered now too well the horror of the war-dance, and a fourful thought darted through his brain that perhaps himself and companion were to be sacrificed in some heathen rite. He recovered his calmness in a moment.

"The good God seeth us, and we are in His abaighty bands, to dispose of as He willeth," were his thoughts.

The Indian stalked onward, and the Abbe soon found himself in the midst of the wild throng of dancers. But his hopes revived, and a prayer of confidence rose to his lips, as no marked the scene which now unfolded itself.

A

EI

13

111

69

0.

III-ile

BIS

les

ard

A group of young men and mailors were swaying to and fro in the movements of their singular dance, circling a green bank with measured steps, while they sing in rule calences, and waved aloft green branches and gurlands of wild flowers. Seated upon the bank, as on a rural throng sit the gentle-featured squaw who had sucked the poison from the wound of Louis; and the young captive's held now repost quietly upon her bosom, while green leaves and bloss ons were strewn thickly around them by the group of mirthful dancers.

Abbe Chule, familiar with the customs of savare tribes, recognized at once the ceremony by which a prisoner was adopted into an aboriginal community. He saw that the Indian woman had chosen the young stranger as her son, having probably lost some yout'iful brave who had before called her mother. The life of the pale-face was henceforth safe, and the youths and maids were now celebrating the seleption which had secured the captive from sacrifice.

Louis raised his head, as he beliefd his reveread friend, and feebly offered his hand. Father Claude knelt upon the sward, and murmured:

"Thank the good God, my son, you are saved! For me it matters not! I am but a withered branch!"

CHAPTER VIII.

GABRIEL ST. ELMO.

GABRIEL Sr. Elmo was a youth of scarcely eighteen summers, but of a vigorous frame, and, animated by a daring and adventurous spirit, had determined to seek his fortunes in that distant clime to which thousands of adventurers were flocking, and which promised to their ardent imaginations a realization of all the dreams that Eastern romance had pictured in the remote countries of the furthest Ind.

Gabriel had not perished, as was thought by the captive survivors of the vessel's living freight. At the terrible crisis when, amid the roar of breakers, he had felt the light skiff dashed upon sharp rocks, and despairingly released his hold of ver, he gave himself up for lost. But Providence had not designed that he should share the fate of his companions. He had himself whirled into deep water, where he came in contact with one of the ship's spars, which he grasped with a desperate clutch.

Awful was the spectacle revealed to his gaze during the brief seconds that he drifted in sight of the wreck! A prolonged shriel, as of mortal agony and fear, rose around him from the voices of drowning men, womer and children; but, above this shriek his sharpened senses could distinguish the triumphal yell of the savages on shore, exulting over their anticipated victims. A flash of rightning occasionally disclosed to his horror stricken eyes the features of some dying wretch, sinking for the last time beneath the surge, or the mangle I corpse of one beaten to death upon the reef. Bu these lumentable sights specify vanished, for the waves, careering like will steeds, whirled the spar to which the youth clung, for away, dashing it hither and thicher until, at last, one end restel upon a shelving sand-bank, where it remained fast. St. Elmo crawled landward, till he reached the hard shore. He ascended the bank, and, feeling secure from the ocean, fell exhausted on the wet grass.

When he awoke, the sun was flooding all the sea with radiance, and he discovered that the place where he had been rust was a small island, at a distance but still within view of the heallands and line of reefs on which the ship had stranded. Far away eastward extended the ocean, far as his vision could sean, and landward only immense forests were to be seen. He looked in vain for any portion of the wreck upon the point where it had broken up. Not a fragment was visible, save the spar on which he had himself escaped.

t

8

8

16

0

172

114 hie

gjø

It was not long, however, before St. Elmo, from his shelter of position on the island, could discern signs of life upon the opposite shore. Smoke carled above the tree-tops, and presently the figures of In lians could be descried, going back and forth from the woods to the sandy beach. The savages were at too great a distance for their voices to be audible, but the young Frenchman knew very well that they were occupied in collecting from the shore whatever articles belonging to the thip had been cast there by the waves. Occasionally a group of the natives would clusp hands and dance about in a circle, at a frejoicing over some new prize, and then they would lisperse, or disappear in the woods. St. Elmo did not venture keyond the covert of woods which grew nearly to the island there, lest the vision of the savages, keen as his own, might top out a new victim for their cruelty.

At last, however, the youth began to realize very sensibly the important fact that he had tasted no food three the previous noon. He penetrated the woody recesses of the island, searching eagerly for berries or fruit, but the place appeared barren as a desert. He ascertained, however, to his apparently never been entered before by a human being. Many birds hopped in the branches over his head, and some flew so near that he might have struck them with a stick; but St. Elmo contented himself with devouring a few eggs of which he rifled a net, and a root or two of palatable flavor which he diegod from the earth. Somewhat satisfied with dies wanty provender, he returned to the beach in time to behold, with astonishment, a fleet of canoes, containing hundreds of Indians, crossing the water that intervened between the island and the mainland.

St. Elmo's first impression was that his retreat had been discovered, and that the savages were in pursuit of him. For a few moments he gave himself up to despon lency, for he had neither weapon of defense—if, indeed, defense were available against so formidable a host-nor any mode of escaping from the insulated patch of woods, in which concealment would be impossible. But a little reflection assured the young man that the Indians could have no saspicion of his presence in this pluce, and that, even should they discover the spar, he might himself remain hid ben in the intricate thickets of the islandwilderness. One apprehension, in leed, trouble I him—that the savages might tow away the spar, in which case he would be left without any norms of leaving the isle; but even this red ction was succeeded by the thought, as his quick eye measured the distance to the other shore, that in the last extremity, he could reach the mainland by swimming. watched the fleet of canoes as they a lyancol, resolved, should they discover the spar, and be tempted to land, that he would make at once for the center of the island to await whatever fate might be in store for him.

But, as it soon became evident, he had little cause for disquict. Following the leading canoe in which sat a plumed ladian grasping a great clab, the rest turned to the left, and passed the island in an extended line, shaping a course for another promontory for to the southernmost point of the coast. He saw in every canea, as it passed, that one or more of the savage occupants held aloft a hooped pole, on which dangled human scalps, the long curls of women, the short locks of men, and the flowing ringlets of children, all ensan-

11

r

r

1,

8

1);

G

h(

guined with blood—gnastly trophies of savage triumph. Sick at heart, he turned away, till the last canoe had disappeared, and then, sitting down upon the shore, he buried his face in his hands, and wept long and bitterly.

At length, rising from his despondent attitude, he saw that the sun had nearly reached its meridian, and was pouring its Burning rays upon the heated sands.

"Why should I remain here?" he soliloquized. "This island affords no means of sustaining life and one may as well be eaten by savages as to have nothing to eat himself. By my faith! I think I will make at once for the other shore, which the red villains have left. At any rate, there is no good to be gained by passing a night more or less with nothing to fill the stomach—as is very plain will be the case—on this desolate island. So, my good piece of a ship, I will e'en take command o' thee once more."

In good time, the young man drew his good spar safely to the mainland, and then kneeled down, as of right he should, and thanked the kind Providence which had thus far protected him. This done, he looked about his new locality, not alone for wherewithal to cut, but for a resting-place through the night—as his voyage from the island had consumed the greater part of the day, and the sun was now entirely sunk behind the forest-trees.

At the first dawn, the young man sprung from his couch of leaves, and, traversing the beach behind the dreadful reef and the rough headland where the ship had met her doom, reached that portion of the shore where, on the night of the catastrophe, the savages had kindled their war-fires and danced in ferocious expectation of their enemies' destruction. Here, what horrors were awaiting his sight! The bodies of his late shipmates, and companions among the emigrants, were lying cold and rigid in the gray dawning, their naked flesh mangled by the rocks or the weapons of savages, their scalpless heads half-buried in the sands. All had been mass acred who escaped alive from the wreck—strong men and teeble women and babes had all fallen beneath the runcor of savage torture. Gabriel St. Elmo looked but a moment upon the fearful scene; he hurried away sickened from the spot.

Various traces of the wrecked ship met the youth's eyes as epars and champs of cordage strewed the sands; and St. Elmo knew that much of her cargo and armament must have been cast ashore and fallen into the hands of the savages. He discovered a stout steel-headed pike, such as were used in hand-to-hand sea-combats, and, wading into the surf, he hastily possessed himself of the weapon. He judged it well, however, not to remain long in the vicinity of the wreck, as the quantity of articles belonging to the ship—bolts of iron, casks, and heavy chains and ropes, that had been washed up by the waves—constituted a store of treasures for In lian capidity, which the youth doubted not would specifily induce another visit from the savages.

Casting a last look at the ocean, he struck into the forest, turning his back to the rising sun, and directing his course westward, toward the region where, as he had been told, was a new settlement of Hollanders at the mouth of the great river of Hudson.

Where, in leed, the Hudson itself lay was a problem not soluble by the young Frenchman's geographical attainments; it leed, the wisest minds of his time might have been puzzled to describe its surroundings, inasmuch as but few mariners had ever penetrated beyond its mouth; but St. Elmo had left his native land for adventure's sake, as well as to seek his fortune, and it was enough for him to be satisfied that the Dutch colony was near the Hudson, and that the Hudson lay to the west from the Cape of Cod, to present to his hopes the cerminty of ultimately reaching it. What to him, the youth with a brave heart and strong limbs, whether he traversed a wilderness of America or the forests of his own France? In his hand was a good weapon, for boar, or wolf, or savage man, and he doubted not that store of food could be found on his journey. Therefore, he went sturdly forward.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CREOLE'S TREACHERY.

Captain Pierre, until the latter had disappeared, and then, uttering an eath instead of a prayer, the rough seaman flung his arm beneath his head, and rolled over to an unquiet slumber, wherein dreams of shipwrecks, combats, quarrels, and perhaps darker experiences of his past life, mingled their dim shades with threatening visions of the future.

Captain Pierre, after reaching the boat, in which watched a couple of the crew, conversed with the two men for some time, with quite as much carnestness, apparently, as had marked his previous colloquy with Rob Ball. He then left the boat, and, moving noiselessly among the slumbering men, awakened two others from their drowsiness, and with these held another conversation. Altogether, it seemed that Captain Pierre was in no mood for sleep.

In truth, however, the Croole had another object in view than to keep awake or hear the sound of his own tongue. He had resolved on a little piece of villainy, and required assistance in its perpetration. For this purpose he had prepared the two men in the boat, and their comrades whom he had awakened—all four staunch followers of their captain, and ready at any time to do his bidding—to await his signal for the commencement of the business in hand.

b

n

n,

U

This business related most immediately to the dreaming sailor, Robin Ball, who, all unconscious of any plot against his person, lay tossing his arms about in broken slumber. The obstinate refusal of Robin to enter into Captain Pierre's plans regarding a speculation in red flesh, had not a little interfered with the latter's usual equanimity; and, foreseeing that the Englishman's influence with a portion of the boat's crew might go far to balk his own intentions, he came to the conclusion that there was no other course left for him but to destroy that influence as speedily as possible. The most certain method of effecting this was to destroy, or render powerless, Ball himself.

He devised a mode of ridding himself of the obnoxious seaman, which would be quite as efficacious as downright murder. This was, to seize him in his sleep, and, after muffling and binding him, so that he could make neither alarm nor resistance, to convey him quietly to the interior of the forest, and there leave him helpless, a prey to wild beasts, savages, or the slow tortures of starvation.

This was a refinement of cruelty quite worthy of Captain Pierre, and he chuckfed not a little over the anticipation of so easily disposing of his enemy. Captain Pierre silently motioned his followers to proceed to their work; and before Robin Ball's fevered dreams were broken, the treacherous fellows had gagged his mouth, casting over his head a thick sailor's jacket, completely precluding speech or vision, while they quickly bound hand and foot the poor sailor, and dragged him noiselessly away from the bank, through the covert of the brush, into the recesses of the forest. The job was executed with such dispatch, and was, withal, so entirely successful, that Captain Pierre was surprised as well as delighted. Not a struggle of Robin Ball revealed his peril to any of his neighbors, who slumbered soundly, without a suspicion of what was transpiring so near them. The Creole rubbed his hands with satisfaction, as he beheld his dextrous accomplices returning stealthily to the boat, where he had remained.

"You have disposed of him, my brave fellows?" he whispered, eagerly, as the villains neared him.

"He'll trouble us no more, I warrant," answered one of the men—a short, low-browed Spaniard. "By St. Dominic, captain, the good Robin was as quiet as a babe. Never before lay he so peaceably."

"He is secure, think you, and will not be able to free him selfy"

"Not if he were ten times as strong, the good bull-dog We bound him to a tree with the ropes, captain; and, by the mass, there will he stay till judgment day, or I'm no sinner."

The rufflan gave vent to a chuckling laugh, as he uttered this speech, but Captain Pierre put his hand to his mouth.

"Be silent, friend, for Robin Ball has his lovers among our crew. And now, I'll e'en take his place, for an hour's nap, worthy Lopez," added he, to the Spaniard. "Keep you watch, and let the night's work be as secret as the grave. Surely, I'll remember this brave service, comrades."

No rest visited Captain Pierre, for his midnight wickedness had fulled to give his apprehensions case. He reflected that, though Robin Ball was out of the camping-place, and exposed to perish in a lonely and desolate situation, still, the tough . sailor might extricate himself by some means, and pursue the boat, in which case the treachery would be exposed, and an unpleasant settlement demanded by Robin's friends. Revolving such thoughts in his busy brain, he resolved, at length, to make sure, if possible, of his enemy's harmlessness in the future; and so, cautiously leaving his couch, he stole back to the boat, and whispered a word to the Spaniard, Lopez, who thereupon roused himself again, and, without alarming his comrades, led the way out of the camp, penetrating the bushes through which Robin Bill had been so quietly conveyed. The Creole followed, amid the lonesome shadows of the forest, until they reached a wild nook, near where a rapid stream dashed from a great chasm in a wall of rocks. On the edge of this chasm grew a large button wood tree, and to this poor Ball had been securely fastened. His person was completely aid from view by underbrush that sprouted from the rocks. Thus he was left to all the horrors of a lingering death. The spot was but a few hundred rods from the shore where the boat was drawn up, but it was, nevertheless, so hidden by rocks, and concealed with tangled evergreen, that no better tomb could have been selected in which to immure a living man. Captain Pierre sceme I to think so, as he looked at the pinioued body of his late follower, for he gave a grunt of satisfaction, and a lyanced toward the buttonwood

"Ho! Robin Bail! we are quits now, I fancy. You will keep a civil tongue in your head for the future, good friend."

Robin Ball's sinewy frame swelled as if it would burst the etrong cords which fistened him to the tree, while a stifled group came from his gagged mouth, which was covered with his own jacket, tied tightly about his head.

" By St. Dominic! it is, after all, no Christian thing to leave the poor devil thus," muttered the Spaniard but the Creole only laughed, sneeringly.

"He will do well enough, Lopez. Nevertheless, I harbor no maker, and would give him quirtes with my degree's point, had I not a horror of bloodshed."

"It were better to all a stricht than to leave to will beasts or famine," suggested the Spaniard.

"By you so, commute? Beshrew me, then, but your posited may as well end the poor fellow's troubles!" said Capt din Pierre, shruz ding his shoulders. "Strike sure, Lapez, and wipe of old secres for yourself and me, and it like you."

The Creole said this with a savage smile on his dark lips, and his vindictive glance on his accomplice with the cold glitter of a serpent's eye. But the works had servedy been uttered when a ruttle was heard near them. Suddenly the pinioned form of Robin Bali sprung from the tree, and fell full against the body of the captain. With a shall whoop, a wild looking figure bounded from behind the buttonwood, to level the gleaming point of a spear against Captain Pierre's bosom.

The Spuniard, Lopez, with a shrick, rashed toward the camp, fully impressed with the belief that a legion of savages was in pursuit of him. The Creole likewise fled, crying at the top of his voice—

. " Indians ! Indians!"

Robin Ball, the while, lay upon the ground, where he had pitched head ong, for, though released from the tree, his broads were still fa tened behind his back, his mouth gagged, and his head muffled.

The sleeping bout's crew, aroused sullenly by the shricks of Lopez, sprung at once for the pinnace, which they east off immediately, paldling off, at a hundred yards' distance from the shore, upon which they momentarily expected a thousand savages, threatening pursuit and destruction of their small vessel. But all remained in silence.

Captain Pierre and Lopez looked at one another, wondering what mysterious power it was that had interposed to shield their victim.

"It is the cunning of the red demons!" at length cried the Creole. "They think to allure us back to shore by keeping quiet. Row, men, and let us be clear of the dogs."

"Saw you Indians, surely?" cried a sailor, as he bent to the oar.

"By the bones of St. Dominie, a legion!" cried Lopez, in response. "Did not the lance of a red villain so, he our captain here?"—and the Spaniard appealed to Captain Peristo contirm his declaration.

"That the heathen's lince was at my heart, I am really to be sworn," and vered the Creole; "but no harm came, for my heels were nimble as your own, good Lopez."

"Ho!" cried one of the crew, "where is Rob Ball"

"Rob B H!" "Where is bold Robin!" echoed from one to another of the men, their bronze faces betraying surprise, as they leaned upon their oars.

"Let us go back," cried the Creole, with well counterfitted sympathy. "But, alas!" he added, "what boots our array against a forest full of foes?"

or

18

13

T.P

1

z,

s,

d

11

10

11

d el

n.

10

33

t

d

H

15

13

n'

n

d

18

"Ay, what, indeed?" cried Lopez, coming to the relief of his leader; "lucky for us that our throats were not all cut as we slept, comrades." Moodily looking at one another, the parsmen resumed their task, and urged the pinnace into the middle of the bay.

Meantime, after falling heavily at the foot of the tree to which he had been tied, Robin began presently to feel a pair of hands at work in the effort to release him from his bonds; and it was not long before his eyes were once more permitted to look upon the moonlight, and his tongue, long gagged and choked, was able to shape itself utterance.

"Mass! but it was a scurvy trick!" at length muttered the seaman, as he looked about him wonderingly. "Where ran the villians?—the kidnapping Pierre, and his dog Spaniard? And who are you, my fine fellow, and what do you here?"

These rapid interrogations were addressed to an individual who stood at a little distance from the Englishman, leaning an a spear.

"I am what I am, Robin Ball."

The Englishman started back in amazement at hearing his

"Are you a Christian man or a savage Indian, or Sathanas himself?" ejaculated he.

"Rob Ball! where's your manners to forget an old friend?" exclaimed the other.

"Gabriel St. Elmo!"

"At your service, Robin Ball," answered the youth, gayly, as he shook the hand of his English friend. 'And ye may well thank Heaven that Gabriel St. Elmo was near you to-night, for small chance of life had ye, good coura le."

"Faith, an' ye work to such good purpose, my young friend, I'll not quarrel with your likings."

St. Elmo proceeded to acquaint Robin Ball with the manner in which he had effected his release; how, after journeying all day through the forest, he had made his couch for the night near the streamlet that gushed by the buttonwood, and had there been aroused by the approach of three of the late ship's crew, drawing the pinionel figure of a fourth, whom they fix tened to a tree, and then left; how he had waited anxiously for a long while, fearful to discover himself to the deserted man, until at length Captain Pierre and Lopez presented themselves; and how, hearing the Creole's proposition to murder the defenseless sailor, he crept nearer to the buttonwood, and, with his sharp pike, severed the cords which confined Robin Ball to the tree, at the same time springing boldly upon the captain with a yell like the whoop of a savage.

Robin Ball listened to his young preserver's recital, and warmly grasped his hand in gratifude, while he vented his rage against the treacherous leader.

"And now," he cried, "stand by me, Monsieur St. Elmo, and if we turn not the tables on this caitiff, my name's not Robin Ball. Come away, and ye shall see me unmask the villain, and, if he refuse me fair combat like a brave man, by the mass, but ye shall see his foul throat black unfer my fingers! Come away, my young friend, and remember that ye have gained Robin Ball's good will, as long as he has life to show it."

The sailor led the way in the direction in which he judged the men to be. In a few moments the two stood upon the bank where lately the boat was drawn up. No boat was there now, and no truce of the ship's crew. But, as Robin directed his gaze across the water, he could see, for away, a dark object upon the surface, and catch a plash like that of oars. The Creole had escaped, and Robin Ball was abandoned.

CHAPTER X.

TIBQUONTAM A PRISONER.

Tisquontam, the Sachem of Mannamoset, who dwell, with the daughter Monoma, in the little wigwam to which Marie nad been conveyed, was a warrior whose youth had been one of strange adventure, and whose future life was destined to yet greater vicissitudes. He was not one of the native chiefs of the Massachusetts, for his cradle had been swung in the sound of Niagara's booming waters, and his childhood nurtured among the Thousand Isles of the great river of Canada, where now the children of France had planted their lodges. There he had dwelt till the blood of manhood coursed through his veins; there he had hunted the otter and sable; there pursued the salmon as it leaped from rapid to rapid of the 8 wift river. And there, too, among the first band of palefaced strangers who pitched their tents on the huntinggrounds of his nation, he had beheld a dark-eyed daughter of the white race, a maiden of France, who had come with her parents to the wilderness of America, in the freshness of her youth and beauty. Tisquentam saw and loved the gentle French girl, and Blanchette returned the passion of her wild admirer; for he was graceful in form and noble of soul, and might have found favor in the eyes of many a princess of his own race. Brief had been their courtship, but their affection was sincere, and Blanchette hesitated not to exchange vows With Lim. But, alas! the Iroquois tribe, to whom the young brave belonged, did not share in the friendliness of Tisquontam to the white strangers who had come among them. Ris ing suddenly, they attacked the small settlement of French and massacred every family. Only one could Tisquontair eave, of all the hapless emigrants-and to do this, he was Obliged to fight his own tribe. He defended the parents of his beloved until they fell beneath the arrows of his Iroquis kindied, and then fiel with his rescued wife into the great wilderness toward the Mohawk. Many moons did the two tovers wander through the forests, pursued by the vengeful Iro queis, who were furious against Tisquontam for the part he hed taken toward them; but the Great Spirit protected his Stablien's flight, till at length they rembed the shores of the reighty ocean. Here Tisquontam made his lodee by the river of Mannamoset, sear where, afterward, the pale-faces were to build their first lodges in New England; and here, with his for Christian wife, the savage dwelt, till it pleased the Great Spirit to bless his eyes with a beautiful child, the pledge of their happy union. Tisquontam was happy in his exile, roaming the forest to hunt for his beloved, storing their wigwarn with the sports of the chase-skins of a hundred beasts, and planes from a thousand birls. Blunchette did not regret her destiny, for she swayed the noble heart of her husband, and taught his lips to pray to the Christian's Gol in her own native toague. But the Great Spirit at length summoned het to rejoin her parents, and Tisquont in was left in his lodge, with only the young child to comfort him.

Bitterly did the red hunter mourn the loss of his wife, and long and often did he weep at the flower covered mound which marked her resting-place; but the infant prattle of his motherless Monoma recalled him to the duties of life. Again, therefore, he took bow and spear, and roamed the forests, to hunt for his child, as he had once hunted for Blowbette.

Monoma grew up gentle and lovely as a wildwood flower, and Tisquontam rejoiced to minister to her every wish. For her he built the islet lodge; shaped a light canoe; searched out a thousand flowers in the valleys and on the hills; for her ae gathered shells by the shore, mosses on the mountain, and care plants in the deep forests. Monoma was to Tisquontam one angel of his life—the angel whom the Great Spirit had given him for his lost Blanchette.

Meantime the bravery and skill of the Iroquois hunter had won him the esteem of the ocean tribes, on whose borders ho dwelt-the Narragansetts, the Pequods, and the Mohegans and he would have been gladly received as a warrior among either; but Tisquontam chose to dwell at Mannamoset, which was between the country of the Narragansetts and Pequods.

al

VQ

0

18 ris

ho

er

to 113

at

f

e,

5

3, et

d,

n

19

e, id

d

13

11,

to

r,

N

id.

er

id

133

ध्ये

ul

10

3.

18

h

3

for there was buried his Blanchette, and there he, himself, wished to lie down when the voice of Manitou should summon him. Tisquontam was known by the tribes as the Lone Sachem of Mannamoset, and they decreed that he should possess the land he had chosen; while, in return, the Iroquois warrior assisted them in their hunts, and oftentimes defended their villages against the incursions of hostile nations. He thus became of influence in the councils of the ocean-tribes, and respected by their wise men and braves.

When news came to Tisquontam, as he sat with Monome in their islet wigwam, that a ship of the strangers was Btranded upon the rocky coast, he straightway grasped his arms and departed to meet the victorious Narragansetts, no to join in their atrocious exploit, but to save, if possible, some victim from their cruelties. But, when he reached the shore the massacre had been finished, and he saw only the scalps of the emigrants daugling from their lances. He, however accompanied the Narragansetts in their triumphal journey homeward, and with them discovered the path of Louis and his companions, pursuing the trail to the mountain Wachusett. Here, unable to gain more from the good will of his savage allies, he had demanded a captive in return for services previously performed, and to his great joy had been allowed to choose the young girl Marie. Thus was the maiden saved from Narragansett captivity, and borne to the lodge of Tisquontam, to be the companion of his gentle Monoma. Glad would have been the heart of Louis could be have divined the fate of his sister.

When Marie felt the warm kiss of Monoma upon her lips, the heard the accents of her native France murmured by the Indian girl. At once the two orphans could commune with 2ach other, and as they lay folded that night in the embrace of sisters, Marie learned a new revelation of innocence—the unnocence of a maiden, born and nurtured in the solitude of an aboriginal forest, with no voice to speak to her but that of fatherly affection, and no unhallowed influence to disturb the deep religion that she daily learned from the solemn teachings of nature—the litanies of waving woods and rolling streams—the sermons of sun and stars and changing seasons.

Next morning, Marie awoke to find the tender eyes of

CD

Tie

W. 11

lust

10

IKY

dra

in

for frie

of

atl

wl

ihr

Mar.

1:3

47]

ro

ph

11:

00 tw

lin

th

W.

W;

1,1

BE

lit

61

111

l.

HZ

11

8

Monoma watching her, while Tisquontam stock at the wigwam-door, arrayed for the chase. The Iroqueis smiled as the French girl's half frightened gize encountered his own, and he reached out his hand with an action at once graceful and encouraging. Marie rose from her soft couch, and advanced toward him.

"Has the white bird slept well in the tent of the Iroquois? Behold! the nestling of Tisquontam's lodge has pale blood in her veins. The white bird has maught to fear."

This was spoken in broken French, and the Indian's manner at once banished all apprehension from the mind of Marie.

"I do not fear my red father!" she said, placing her hand in that of the chief.

Monoma stole softly to the side of her new friend, and wound an arm around her neck. The two maidens were very lovely, as they thus stood together, and Tisquontam's eye grew moistas he looked at them. But, presently, Marie's fair brow became clouded, and she sunk suddenly at the red-man's feet, clasping her hands as a suppliant.

"Oh!" she cried, "where is my brother—my beloved Louis? Where is Abbe Claude?"

"Oh! chief," she continued, "you have save! me—you are able and good! Save my brother!—oh! if he be not already martered by the cruel—" Marie could utter no more, her sobs stilled her voice. Monoma's tears mingle! with hers. Tisquontam was deeply affected.

"Was it the white bird's brother?—the youth whom the Narra consetts have borne to their village?—and the old chief the medicine-man—"

"Abbe Claude—the good father—alas!" murmured Marie, rith a flood of tears.

"Tisquontam will seek the trail of the captives!" exclaimed the Iroquois, as if he had taken a salden resolution. "He will bring the white bird tidings of her bather and of the aged father. Let the white bird be happy; Monoma will sing for her a song of the pale-faces. Tisquontam will return ore the sun falls upon yonder bank."

Marie's eloquent face expressed her gratitude to the good Indian. She took hastily from her bosom a small gold cross.

on which a talisman was engraved, and extended it to Tisquontam.

"Here!" she murmured. "It is a cross which my brother will recognize, and know that it is from Marie. It was the last gift of our mother who is dead."

The Indian comprehended her meaning, and then, pointing to the mossy river-bank opposite the wigwam, where the last tays of the sun were went to tremble ere they were withdrawn in the west, repeated his promise to return at the lauri indicated, then turned and took his departure through the forest-aisles, while Monoma tenderly dried the eyes of her friend, and led her forth from the lodge to the flowery banks of the islet-stream, where presently they were twined in each other's arms, exchanging their guileless confidences.

Tisquontam had traversed the league or two of thick woods which bounded his own little domain, whence he could catch, through the trees, a glimpse of the quiet bay-where, in a small inlet, he had realy a light canoe, that he often used to chorten his distances by crossing the water at this pointwhen, as he diverged toward the shore, he was startled by the voice of a child, apparently in extreme terror. The Iroqueis plunged through the thickets, and presently attained a spot Where he beheld two men in strange earb, which he at once recognized as that of the pale-faces. These men bore in their arms two struggling Indian cirildren, whom they were half strangling to quiet their cries, as they carried them rapidly toward the water. Tisquontam did not hesitate. Pealing his war-Whoop till it rung through all the wood, he sprung with uplifted club upon the foremost white man, whom, with one blow, he leveled to the ground.

The other pale-face, terrified at the sudden appearance of an Indian, and the shrill whoop which was answered by a bundred echees, released the child and darted toward the shore. Tisquontam found himself alone with two screaming urchins, and the white man he had struck, lying bleeling at his feet.

It was but for an instant; a pistol-shot, followed by another, and a third, startled the air. Tisquontam felt a sudden pain through his head. A mist gathered over his eyes; his lamba thew faint; and he fell to the ground across the man whom he had struck down beneath his club. Soon a figure, followed by two or three, and then more, cautiously emerged from covert, and approached him.

fre

do:

$6.00

na

ici

W

h

k

Cri

W

pr

20

CI.

T

Ca

31 fr

li

st

ti

"By St. Dominic, captain! I believe you are right. There was but one of them-though, as I'm a Christian man, I could have sworn I hear! a hundred yells," cried the foremost of the new-comers.

"And so you run like a hundred devils?" sneered Captain Pierre, as he followed close behind, "and left poor François acre, to be knocked if the head! Look, man, quickly, and see it his hurt be mortal!"

The Spaniard, Lopez, thus adjured, dragged the Indian from the body, and, raising the latter in his arms, disclosed a severe wound upon the skull, which was bleeding profusely. The man breathed, however, and was apparently only stunned.

"Now, up with him to the boat!" cried the Creole, in a sharp, abrupt tone; for, since his riddance of Robin Ball, he had little difficulty in controlling the rest of the crew—"and the youngsters—where are they?"

"Sife and fast, captain," answered a stalwart rufflan, who was engaged in gagging one of the Indian children, while Lopez secured the other. The poor creatures, after hearing the report of the firearms, had made no effort to escape, apparently transfixed with fright.

"To the boat with them!"

"Ay, ay, captain!"

"Is the redskin dead?" said Captain Pierre to Loper, stooping over Tisquontam.

"No! 'tis but a flesh-wound! The bullet has grazed his kull, though, and clipped the savage's sculp-lock! Look you, captain—shall I finish him?"

"He's not dead, say you?"

"By St. Dominic, no! And, faith, 'twere shame to kill so stout a knave! Look at the variet's muscle, Captain Pierre. He were worth seventy pistoles, an' he were at Bermuda of the Havana!"

"Think you that, Lopez?" cried the Creole, his eyes sparkeling with greed. "Away with him, then, to the boat, for I doubt we shall get no more o' the cattle. We must away from this bay, or a legion will be after these cubs of heathen dom. Lively, comrades !—to the boat!"

rod

(OID

CIP

of

ain

ris

Se8

ian

la

ly.

nly

83

he

nd

ho

ile

ng

pe,

118 ok

SO

re.

OI

ay

Without more delay, the kidnappers lifted Tisquentain, together with the Indian children, and hore them to the pinnace, where already five other children of either sex lay farianced hand to foot, like lands for the mart. The It quals was securely fistened, when the oarsmen immediately paled he pinnace out into the smill bay, through the colon waters kirting the coast, toward the sea. Meanthine, some of the crew were busy in riseing the masts and ben libra latterns all, while others stowed compactly in the boat's bows the store of provisions which were to sustain them on their hold voyage to the southern islands. There were thirteen men of the crew, who had kidnapped seven red children, together with Tisquontam. Captain Pierre chuckled as he looked upon his captives, and calculated how many hard pistoles so fine a cargo would fetch him.

Maintime, Monoma and Marie waited expectantly for the sun's decline, when the Iroquois was to return with news from the Narragansett village. But the parting beams of light trembled upon the mossy river-bank, and long shadows stole around the wigwam; then twilight, and gloom, and moon-rising fellowed—but Tisquontam came not.

int

rec

Wi

TY

On

lei

the

it

en

ei)

14.

re

th

In

fr

aı

re

11 cl

al

81

11

I

n

8

6

1

CHAPTER XI.

SAMEEDA, THE DAUGHTER OF MASSASOTT.

Many moons passed, and still the white captives remained unmolested in the Narra cansett village. Abbe Claude learned that his life, as well as that of his young charge, Louis, had been decreed sacred by decision of the savaces in council. Whether the Narragansetts, who, in the heat of their triamph, had sacrificed all the other emigrants thrown into their power, were now disposed to preserve the remaining two as living trophies of the prowess of the tribe, or whether some other line of savage policy actuated their course, could not be divined by the captives; but, it became evident that they were both received under the protection of the red-men, and that, though still watched as prisoners, they were treated as members of the common family.

It might be that a spice of superstition mingled in the natures of the Indians, and that they deemed it better to restrain the exercise of further cruelty toward the strange invalers, whom they firmly believed to be sent by Hobbomocko, the Evil One, for the especial trial and tribulation of the real possessors of the land. As the Chinese and Yezidees endeavor at all times to keep, as they express it, "on good terms with the devil," so the aboritines were accustomed to pay a sort of deference to the Arch Enemy, for the purpose of conciliating any unusually hostile feelings which he might be supposed to entertain; and thus, in the reservation of their captives, the skrewd Narragansetts doubtless conceived themselves to be subserving a double purpose: that of retaining eving monuments of their own valor, and palliating with Hobbomocko the deed of wholesale massacre they had committed upon the hapless passengers of the ship.

During many seasons and years, mysterious and startling rumors bad been rife through all the northern tribes. Strange intelligence had reached them, by runners who had visited the red nations of the South, concerning armies of terrible men, with beards and white faces, who had come from across the great waters, walking the raging waves in a "big canoe," and carrying in their hands thunder and lightning. But now, at length, the tribes of the North had delivered their brethren of the strange enemies. The "big canoe" was now no more; it had been ground to pieces on the rocks of Massachusetts, and the invaders had become as the dust of the carth.

These were the words of the medicine-men and chief councilors in the grand lodge of the Narragansetts; therefore the warriors of that tribe no longer feared the pale-faces. They resolved that their captives should be held as slaves, in order that the far southern tribes might know the valor of the ocean Indians. For the Narragansetts could behold the great sea from their hunting-grounds, while the south-tribes dwelt among the big rivers and swamps.

bt

6/1

sd

il.

h, er,

113

CT

ed

th

117

f

10 çe

) -

f

13

1,

n

0

t

1

-

3

J

So, moons passed away, and still Father Chaude and Louis remained prisoners among the red-men. They had learned the tongue of the Indians, and mingled in the councils of the chiefs. Abbe Claude spoke words of wisdom to the old men, and Louis hunted with the young braves, trapping the beaver and shooting the wild deer in the forest.

The good Abbe spoke to the ancient chicfs, who no longer went forth to battle, of the sweetness that dwells with peace. He told them of the great Manitou of the white men, and His mighty works. He comforted the age I braves when the Great Spirit's voice was heard calling them to the eternal hunting-grounds; and his tongue murmured gentle words to the little children whose fathers were no more.

Louis soon became beloved by the Indian maidens. They wave rich belts of wampum to hang his quiver, made soft moccusins for his feet, and plucked the feathers of engles to knit him a warrion's head-dress; for the young stranger was comely to look upon, skillful in the chase, and graceful in the dance.

Sameeda, the daughter of the Sachem, Massasoit, was the pride of her father's tribe. Whose voice was so sweet in the songs of morning? Whose feet moved so lightly in the evening dance? Who was so fleet upon the hills? Like a young fawn was Sameeda, daughter of the mighty wan-chief,

Ed.

tri

10

C8

it

18 fr

at

ti

81

th

11

C

0

b

1

Sames In, the Narragansett princess, learned to love the young stranger-chief who had been made captive by her father's low and spear. The voice of Louis become like the marray of fountains in her cars, and his glances stole into the losom like sunlight into the will-wood bowers. Sho loved in secret, speaking no word, for she feared the wrath of her stern size. Therefore she would wanter away in the stillness of night to seek the shores of the sea—there to think alone of the young pale chief.

To the skent shore oftentimes repaired Louis; for he, too, 'ovel to gaze upon the broad ocean, and dream of the land he had left beyon! it. No wonder then that upon the lonely beach the youth we! maiden met, and, need we say, loved?

He whispered to her, in broken but intelligible words, tales of his for native land, and told the sall story of his own orphaned life, and of that beloved one, the sister of his youth, whose fair form he believed was now mouldering on Wachusett's height. Sameeda's heart throbbed with beautiful sympathy. She wound her arms around the neck of her lover, she dried his tearful eyes with her long, dark hair, and then murmured sweetly, in the musical language he had taught her:

"Sameed's will be the sister of the white chief. The daughter of Massasolt will make her couch at the feet of him she loves!"

Ah! how rapturously spel those hours of dear communion by the sounling sea. But a cloud was arising to darken soving hearts and starry hopes.

Satento was a mighty chief, and medicine-man of the tribe, wise in council, and curning in the field. The enemies of the learning terms of his valor and wis lon, and no less was he dreaded by the braves of his own nation; for he dealf in strange secrets, and it was said that Hobbonrocko had tharged his cyil spirits to minister to Sakanto's will. Met feared his eye when its glances crossed their own; children fled from his path, to hide their faces in the bosoms of their trembling mothers.

But Sakanto was chief among the war-councilors, and his

ıl,

10

15

10

0

10

of 10

k

0,

10

3

28

n

1,

1-

J-

Γ,

n

14

10

m

n

n

e,

f

33

14

d

2

n

ir

18

tribes that dwelt by the waters. He it was who but called together the young braves, and bade them watch the big cance from the dark forests that overlooked the occur. He it was, the old men said, who commanded the inds of nor to lash up the waters into anger, and to drive the big cano whom frightful rocks, that his red nation might conquer the white strangers. Therefore was Sakanto feared by all—even more than was Massiso't, the Sachem of many nations.

Sakanto staiked from his wigwam, through the village, smiling not on the meidens, nor nodding his haughty head to the braves. He entered the lodge of Massasoit, and smoked with the Indian king the pipe of council. When the dark chieftain returned again to his wigwam, a whisper went from one to another of the youths and moidens that Samecola, the beautiful princess, had been betrothed to the medicine man!

Sorrow bowel the hearts of the youthful princess and her lover, when next they met beside the murmuring sea. Samee la knew the power of that dread chieftain who sought her hand, and that Massasoit would never dare to provoke his anger, even should her own prayers be able to move her father's sympathies.

"Alas! must I fly from my beloved?" she cried, weeping upon the bosom of her pale-faced friend. "Must Sameeda Bit down in the lodge of Sakanto, and smile no more?"

"Never!" answered Louis, passionately. "One being whom I loved have your cruel kindred torn from me; but from Sameeda I will never part!"

As the youth spoke, the figure of a man approached. It was the aged Abbe Chade, whose calm voice was now heard:

"My son! is it in-lead so? Do you love this dam, in ref. the red people?"

"Father-tather, unite us!" was the currest reply of Loria be made one by the rates of our holy religion. O, falce it is two loving hearts in the blessed bonds of marriage! hap' red the young men.

"My son, what would you do? Know you not that Sakanto is the most powerful chieftain of the nation, save alone the king Massasoit? We are but captives, and at the mercy of our rude masters."

"We can but die, Abbe Claude. Unite us, and let us & together far from the Narragansett villages. I have tearned from a runner the route to the English settlements in the Fouth. Thither we will fly! Say you not so, Sameeda! Wilt go with me?"

"Sameeda is the wife of the white chief. She will follow him to his nation's hunting-grounds."

"Hear you that, Abbe Claude? No time is to be low! Unite us in marriage, and we will away to gether. God will conduct us."

Louis supported the light form of Sameeda, who gazed into his eyes with a look of mute confidence. The knew not what narries meant; she cared to know but one thing—that her fate would be joined to that of the young pale face forever.

"Heaven wills it!" at length murmured the Abbe, devoutly.
"I feel that it is right, and that our Father in Heaven sanctifles the union. Ye shall be married, dear children!"

Joining the hands of the youthful lovers, the good priest knelt and prayed that their union might be blessed by the Creator of Love. There, in the right of the bright stars and the rolling ocean, in the hour of night, Sameeda plighted her faith to the stranger who possessed her heart, and received the carnest response of her lover's vows. And then Abbe Claude uttered the solemn adjuration:

Whom Go I hath joined to rether, let no one put asunder." The nuptial party then stole from the lonely beach; all became quiet, save the low murmur of surges upon the sands, or the sough of swaying forest-trees that overlooked the waters.

But the quiet was broken by the plash of a paldle in the wave, and from the shadow of a jutting rock, close beneath the spot where Sameeda and her lover had knelt, shot forth a small cance. It skimmed over the smooth water, along the thelving beach, and creet within it, his ominous glance following the receding figures of the maiden, the youth, and tue priest, appeared a dusky Indian form.

It was SAKANTO, medicine-man of the tribe!

CHAPTER XII.

THE CREOLE'S PIRATICAL CRUISE.

MEANWHILE, during the transition of events in the Marragansett village, Captain Pierre and his crew steered their little wessel to the southward, coasting the perilous shouls of Capo afollacar, rounding the ides of Cupewak and Sogaquob, names new forgotten, or usurped by modern appellations, and keepmg close to land withal, until the compass which they had preserved from the wreck showed them the favorable place for striking forth to the islands lying nearest to the continent. No storms interposed, and their progress during the long same mer days and moonlit nights, was checked by no tedious calm; without danger or delay, they at length reached the Havana. Here, taking counsel with their leader, the company disposed of the pinuace, and sold the Indian children to the captain of a merchantman, who was about to sail forthwith for Bermuda, where servants of the sort were then in great demand. Tisquontam, who had recovered from his wound, was kept, in hopes of his fetching even more than forty-five pistoles, the round sum which had been received for each of the seven children, made and female; and then the gold, gained by the sale of the pinnace and slaves, was, by Captain Pierre's advice, invested in the purchase of a brigantine, wherewith they resolved to essay their fortunes on the high seas.

The Creole found no difficulty in increasing his company by the enlistment of several desperate follows, then idling about the island, ready for any alventure, and who glully entered into an engagement to share the excitement and profits of a rover's life. The Creeke selected the Spaniard, Lopez, for his chief officer or lieutement, and, mustering the men, now increased to a score or more of reckless desperadoes, opened his plans in business style.

"We are now about to follow the example of many brave gentlemen," said Captain Pierre. "There be great store of treasure for strong hands to win, and I bethink me, comrades, of a notable place whereto we may gollantly stor. It is a craimer from I near the island of the D teb, colled Caras on Indiana, and Spanish hands with I had a siver, saids and Indiana study larges, if long, and quicksilver, to other with spices, vanilla, a chiral and come, which fetch heavy prices at the Havana, or in the new colonies of America. Peralyenture, comrades, if we take a dezen of these Spanish bods, as they co on their trading occasions, we shall find such mass of rich booty as washing a great cruising ship for us. Then can we trade briskly in slave, which are easily caught, as were those heathen imps, and maybap make capture of some great galleon of the Done or Portugals, so that we be speedily enriched for our lives."

The announcement of this scheme was received with much favor by the Creole's motley followers, and they set themselves directly to the work of fitting their brigantine for the voyage. Nevertheless, as it was not thought best to leave any traces whereby their course from the Havana might be too easily traced, Captain Pierre directed his lieuteaant, Lopez, as well as others of the crew, to give out among the townspeople that the vessel was bound to France, to bring thence certain stores for the new colonies of that nation. Meantime, Captain Pierre purchased arms and ammunition, with such part pieces of gold as he had saved from the wreck of the emigrant-ship.

Very soon the brigantine was made ready for sea, and word given to her crew to repair or board, which all were right glad to do, impatient for the adventures and booty promised by the leader. But, as they were about to weight the hor, there appeared a tall, well-favored man appn the place, whose bronzed counteness gave evidence of its possessor's acquaintance with the vici sicular of American Charles. He was, moreover, well appeared, and wore a talen of much dignity. With him came a sea-captain, who commanded a large ship of Britain, which was anchored in the roadstead, and behind followed a couple of mariners, who bore a heavy and iron-bound box.

"I would have speech immediate with the captain of this brigantine, whereof I hear that she is presently departing for France," said the new-comer."

"I am at your service, monsieur," replied the Creole, In French, which was the language used by the other. "What would you of Captain Pierre Dacot?"

"Captain Pierre Dacot-If that he your note-1 desire to bargain with you for my passage hence to France, whicher I am bound," said the stranger.

The Creele started, for he had not looked for such an application. Nevertheless, he found himself compelled to make answer, and therefore rejoined that the brigantiae's accommodations were very narrow, and badly suited to the comfort of a man of quality such as the applicant appeared to be.

"Oh, as for that matter, worthly Captein Pierre Dacot," returned the stranger, "I am not difficult to please in the matter of accommodations, having bonne many hardships in my day. But it is necessary that I depart speedily, for there to those in France I would fain see before I die. Some stars of wealth I have, Captain Pierre!" continued he, with a glance at the iron-bound box, which a sailor had deposited on the land at his feet—"and I promise you will be no leser by the bargain we shall make."

The Creple's avaricious spirit was roused at once; and as his eye became riveted on the chest, wherein his active fancy already pictured ingots of gold, and precious stones in glittering confusion, he paused a moment, evolving in his dark mind the first inception of a scheme to get possession of the Stranger's treasure, at small risk to himself.

"If such be your willingness, monstour," he said, presently, and if you car abde such poor combers as we can bester, I will chang make Side to dispose a best at your service-yourself being without company."

brigations will have to carry," replaced the cuttage backen years brigations will have to carry," replaced the order of the "My good friend here, and but a capation who as a modely professed the a case, which I would place y accept; but unlackily he must wait for freight of politics from the maintand, and I must needs make what haste I may."

"And good faith," responded the blaff merchant-captair,
"I am right both to lose your good company, air, which I have had from the Franch settlements. Fare you well, sir, for what says the song—'The best of friends must part.' Saying this, the Briton shook the hand of his late passenger, and, turning to Pierre Dacot, cried out—"You'll find him a prince and a Christian man!"

The Crecle's lip twitched, as he attempted to maile; and the stranger, with another friendly grasp of the merchantman's hand, prepared to get aboard the brigantine, first ordering his strong box to be lifted from the strand. "The trash is somewhat weighty," he remarked, "and 'twill tax a sturdy man's strength, mayhap, to handle well."

"Whip up you savage Tisquontam," said the Creole, addressing Lopez. "He is strong as a bullock, and will have the chest stowed safely in a trice."

The two villains exchanged glances; while Tisquontam, driven ashore, was commanted to take up the box, which ho did with scarcely an apparent effort, much to the astonishment of two Euglish mariners, who had strained their tough joints somewhat in conveying the ponderous burden from their own vessel to the shore. The Indian, in grave silence, carried the chest over the brigantine's side and deposited it on the deck, as if it had been but a traveler's portnernteau.

"A lusty rascal, Captain Pierre," remarked the English skipper, surveying Tisquontum's muscular proportions and stately demeanor with an admiring glance; while the Indian himself, having accomplished his task, remained with folded

b

0

b

F

7 ξí

1

B

t

d

arms, and calm eyes, near the taffrail.

"The dog is sturdy enough," answered Pierre Dacot; "but his room were as good as his company in my small craft. So, if you like, friend, you shall have him for a hundred pistoles."

"Tis too much," said the Englishman. "Mayhap, wo might agree on a matter of sixty pistoles; but, a hundred—my purse would never stand that, shipmate." So saying, the Briton turned away.

Get you forward, there, red dog!" cried the Creole; but Tisquontum, absorbed, perchance, in thoughts of the daughter of his love, appeared not to hear the gruff voice of his kidenapper.

"Hound! do you mock me?" roared Captain Pierre, observing the Indian's inattention. "Take that, now, to help your savage wits!" Scizing a rope's-end, he dealt his unconreious captive a sudden blow upon the face, stripping the skin from his forehead in a bleeding welt.

"By St. Denis!—that's a cruel stroke!" exclaimed the French passenger, in disgust at the unprovoked assault. "Nay, may!" he continued, interposing his arm; for he perceived that the Creole had alrealy raised his weapon for knother blow, as if apprehensive of the red-man's resentment "Tis no Christian act to strike the defenseless! Look you sir, how the poor man bleeds!"

"Bleed he, or die he, the loss is mine own, since there's no sale for such cattle at a fair price!" rejoined the Creole, moodily. "But there's no danger—the heathen dog is tough."

The stranger turned from the brutal rover and caught the eye of Tisquontam fixe I on his own, with a glance at once intelligent and grateful. He felt compassion moving him at the sight, and a sudden impulse inspired him to rescue the poor savage from his cruel owner. Turning immediately to the English mariner, who, like Limself, had witnessed with disgust the uncalled for brutality of Captain Pierre, he said, hastily:

l,

t

3

11

O.

17

h

,11

1

it

0,

19

73

19

1;1

CI

d

re,

of P

"When good friends part, Captain, it is a good custom that bids to exchange tokens of remembrance between them. Give me now that plain gold ring on your little finger, Captain, and on my part, I will bestow this Indian Hercules upon you for a body-servant. Nay, no demur, I pray you, friend—I like it well."

Saying this, and in spite of the opposition of the British captain, who protested against the smallness of the equivalent which the Frenchman demanded, being a ring of little value against one hundred pistoles, the price asked for Tisquontam, the money was counted out and paid into the Creole's hands, though the latter would fain have retracted his offer, when he true that his passenger was to pay for the slave. For the treacherous Creole had resolved in his own mind to make away with the Frenchman, so soon as they should be got upon their voyage, in order that the strong box, which, as he rightly deemed, contained much wealth, might full into the hands of himself and pirate-crew.

But Heaven had ordained all these events for its own wise purposes, and so Captain Pierre was constrained to adhere to his largain, and transfer the Indian man Tisquontam to the morehant-captain. The poor savage, who seemed very well to comprehen I the motives of compassion which had impelled the Treuch stranger to become his purchaser, cast a look of renewed gratitude toward the latter, as he followed his new master and the two sailors from the brigantine. Captain Pierre, looking after him with a gloomy expression, gave harded orders to cast off the vessel. Presently the forts and harbor were passed, and, before evening, the switt-sailing little craft had many a league of ocean between herself and the flavana.

But the Creole, impatient to obtain possession of the strong box belonging to his passenger, and to proceed, thereafter, on his voyage of plander to the windward islands, did not delay developing his design to the Spaniard, Lopez, and a few of his ready men. It was resolved at once to attack the Frenchman in his sleep, and make away with him as speedily as possible, easting his body into the sea; after which his treasure could be ransacked, without making known the circumstance to all the rovers; and thus, whatever valuables should be sceared, could be divided among the few actual participants in the deed of murder. In this manner the Creole desired to rob his passenger and cheat the most of his followers of their share of the plunder.

At the lead of night, the Frenchman was startled from his slumber by the sudden stroke of a knife, wielded by the ruffan Spaniard, which, though intended to penetrate his heart, fell short of the mark, and only inflicted a slight wound, sufficient to arouse the intended victim to a vigorous straggle for his life. No less than three villains were assuting him at one, while, by the glimmer of a binnacle-lump, the makeious eyes of Captain Pierre overlooked the work of his taytod bus, type site the French and's resting-place—a small looker in the round-house—was an open window, and through this could be discerned the water, black as the grave, for neither moon not star was visible in the heavens.

It had been the intention of Lopez to strike so sure a blow in the sleeping Frenchman's breast, as should deprive him of all power of resistance, when he might be dragged immuBut either the dim light misted his sight, or his unsteady hand deceived him—he missed his aim, and the next moment felthis own throat compressed in the gripe of his contemplated victim.

Then took place, in that narrow round-house, a deadly conflict. The passenger, armed only with a short dirrer, made shift to keep at bay not only the three villains, but the captain himself, who came, cutlass in hand, to their assistance. Maught illumined the scene but the dull binnacle-light, whose rays dimly entered through the open door of the roun l-house, and no noise was made but the wrestle of those who attempted to grasp the Frenchman, and once or twice the sound of a heavy stroke against the punels of the betth. At last, a desperado, who had approached within fatal range of the brave passenger's weapon, received a powerful downward blow upon his heart, and sunk heavily to the deck, mortally wounded, while the Frenchman made a disperate spring for the round-house door.

"We must call the crew—this fellow is a devil?" muttered Captain Pierre, placing a whistle to his lips, and blowing it shrilly. Immediately a rush of feet was heard from the forward part of the brigantine, and the Creole, darting from the round-house, beheld Lopez, the Spaniard, and his French passenger, grappled together beside the starboard taffrail of the vessel, bending like wrestlers in a close embrace, their arms locked, and the knife of each glittering in the obscurity.

"Upon him, comrades! Hew him to pieces!--the French-man! He has killed one of us already!" cried Captain Pierre to the men, who now came harrying att. "Stab ham, or Lopez will be strangled."

It did in local seem that the Spaniar is breath was about to be effectually stopped, for the Prenchman had suitenly dropped his own weepon, and, clasping the armed hard of Lopez with his left fingers, shided his right to the farmed of his adversary, which he pressed against the tellical with a grasp like iron. The licatement's contrades saw his danger, and, with raised cutlasses, rushed together upon the now unarmed Frenchman But, ere they could reach him, the tombat was decided by the weight of the two men breaking the taffrail on which they pressed so heavily. It parted with a crash, and pirate, as well as passenger, fell headlong from the brigantine, and disappeared beneath the black waves under her quarter

A single sound—half gurgling gasp, half shriek—came to the ears of the horror-stricken rovers. Then the brigantine plunged on her way, and the moaning wind in her shrouds was all that disturbed the night's stillness.

Captain Pierre, quickly as possible, ordered the vessel to be rounded to, and a boat to be got in readiness. But in vain the ready sailors listened for a voice or struggle in the water All remained quiet, and the Creole, with a curse, led the way to the round-house, where, all stark, lay the body of the rufflan whose breast had been cloven by the Frenchman's dagger.

"Curses! this business has cost me two of my best men!" muttered the Creole. "Ay, indeed, better had I lost three than Lopez, for he stuck at nothing that I commanded!"

Thus grumbled Captain Pierre, as the slain rover's body was committed to the waves; but his regrets became less poignant when a scrutiny of the lost stranger's strong box revealed to him, not, indeed, as he had fancied, ingots and diamonds, but still a goodly store of roubles and pistoles, enough to ransom a whole ship's crew from Barbary. The Croole's eyes danced over the plunder, and forgot Lopes.

CHAPTER XIII.

MONOMA AND HER GUEST.

MARKE AND MONOMA watched long into the night, await ing the return of Tisquontam. Sleep, at last, overpowered them, and the hour of morning broke once more. Still the Indian hunter did not return.

"I will seek my father's trail," said Monoma; and, kissing the cheek of Marie, she bounded away to the forest-path.

Monoma was no novice in wooleraft; her steps from infancy had been accustomed to thicket and turf. The had tracked the wild fox to his covert in the summer, and pursued during wintry moons the fleet-footed deer or howling wolf far away over icv crusts and drifted snows. She was fundar with every sign by which the aborigines trace their friends or foes through the pathless wilds; for often had she rounded with her father for leagues and leagues a vay from their islethome, scaling the great hills of the interior, or launching their birchen cance upon the rivers of the Penobscot, the Merrimac, and Piscataqua, even to the far Connecticut. Consequently, Monoma thought little of threading the wood-depths, and bund no difficulty in striking very soon the trail of her tuber, Tisquontam, on the following day.

What terror shook her frame when she reached, at length, the spot where the brief structle between the Indian and his captors had taken place. She had a upon the transpled grow, and saw the directived blads, where the black that come from Tisquontum's worm I had dried. The marks I the rough trail made by the kidnappers as they dratted their victions to the pinnace, and at last saw, with renewed grief, the paint of the Lout's keel upon the white sunds of the shore. Then, as the full remixation of her father's fate broke over her mind, and she felt that he had been carried away by enemies, she set down upon the shore overwhelmed with sorrow.

But no tear tame, even then, to moisten the burning eyes of Monoma; for her will not me, even in its despair, refused the manifestations customary to civilized life. She remained made and makingless, thinking of her size, but even in her a ray striving to shape forth plans for following and rescuing the captive warrior.

Monorms well knew, by the signs she had diligently examined, that no warparty of Indians had not be prisoner of her ather; for, apart from the feet that Tisquontum was on the lest of terms with all the neighboring tribes, and that distant retimen could not have approached these shores without previous notice of their coming, she knew hisewise that the print upon the shores and and their price her quick apprehension to the that for pont on most have fillening the hands of some savivors of the white structures lately east upon the coast. But this conviction hereased her alarm, for she feared, after discovery of the make of conflict on the grass, that her father milks have incurred the mater of the strangers, or been neized as a victim in revenge for the mater of the wrecked emigrants.

Monoma ventured to hope even amid her despair. Tisquon-tam was acquainted with her mother's tongue, and could therefore explain his kindred as well as fliendlines to the pale-fices; and perhaps, reflected the maiden, after all, he has been taken but as a guide to the strongers through the islands, and will be allowed to return when he has safely conducted them to the great occas. Monomas stahol her grief, and timed her face once more to the holes where the lonely

More waited her coming with ill-concesied auxisty.

And for high passed, and with recoming more Monoma proportion at forth on a journey to the Narra dust their recoming the recipies hours, the Indian girl had promised have made a first that she would have a sixtened promised to provide Tisquotten on his visits to the activity the same great such twice she had passed the Careshold of the great School We same quen, which was the warrior's name of the powerful Massasot. She now resolved to go alone to the lodges of the Narragansetts, not to make known the disappearance of her father, but only to note if the white captives were still spared from sacrifice. Marie, in truth, desired to know the worst, for the arealful susp use in which she remained, concerning her brother, was torturing in the extreme. Rather, in leed, would she welcome death, knowing that her friends had preceded her to the Musious of Rest.

d

d

t

4

()

1)

Monoma, therefore, promising to return by evening, set forth at the first dawning to traverse the wools and hills toward the Narragansett town. Much she dreaded that she should arrive only to witnes the catastrophe of sacrifice, or to hear that the fearful rite of vengeance had been consummated. She hoped, however, that the captives were still living, and resolved, even though it might involve her own safety, to intercede for their preservation with the king, Musasoit, should the tribe have yet delayed their death. With these feelings her fleet footsteps soon carried her to the shore, where Tispiontant's cance still lay concealed. The little bark clove the still waters of the bay from point to point, until the country of the Narragansetts was gained, and she stood among Woosameguen's lodges.

Many daughters of chiefs and young braves greeted the arrival of Monom, in the village, for she was known far and wille as the child of Tisquentam, the Lone Sachem of Mannamose'; but to the interrogatories concerning her father, the prudent mailen only replied that he had gone forth on the hunt alone, and she had come to visit for a few hours her Narragansett censins, and then return swiftly to the lodge of Tisquentum. This answer satisfied all inquiries, and Monoma was permitted to range freely with her young Indian friends from wigwam to wigwam of the village. It was not long, therefore, before she learned all that could be communicated by the Narragansett maidens, and discovered, greatly to her joy, that the captive youth, Louis, was adopted by a squaw of the tribe. Moreover, she soon obtained a glimpse of the French youth and his older friend, and saw that by the appeared calm arel in good Lealth. Men am let all to the admiring braves who had greeted her, and, with a flowery garland or two presented by some gentle squaws, set out on her return to the islet, which she reached without difficulty just as the sun was declining.

Great was the sorrow of the Indian maiden to find that Mass was unable to comprehen ther words or even recognize her at all. The anxiety, excitement and fear, which had alternated in the peor French girl's mind during the last few days, but at length forced her delicate frame to succumb, and she now lay upon her bed in the lodge, burning and tossing with a reging fever, that completely deprived her of reason.

Ten lerly, though sadly, throughout that night, Monoma watched beside Marie, preparing for her relief the simple herbal medicaments which, in common with all aboriginal females, she knew well how to cull and prepare for use. But the French maiden's malaly was of a grievous nature, and did not yield lightly to the young leech's skill. Not alone that night succeeding her return from the Narragansett village, but many nights, and many weeks succeeding, Monoma tended the sick and wandering girl, till at last the fever broke, and the light of intelligence once more revisited the stricken Marie.

When the crisis of the disease was at length over, and Marie could realize the sweet hope of life, and feel that, though in savere captivity, Louis was yet in no danger, but, with the good Abbe, was allowed all liberty to rove amid the tribe, she began soon to gather strength, and looked forward with returning confidence to a meeting with her brother in the forest, and perhaps their ultimate escape to the white settlements. Monoma encouraged the anticipation, though her own spirit was growing every day more despondent, because of the long absence of her father.

Meanwhile, the store of provisions with which, at Tisquon-tam's departure, the wigwam had been bountifully supplied, had long since been consumed, and Monoma's skill was fain to supply the place of her father. Daily, ere the sun penetrated the forest, and often at ni, ht, when Marie slept, the Indian huntress would steal forth through the glades and by the river banks, to set her snares for game, or launch her arrows with uncring dexterity, until, loaded with her spoils, she could better to the lodge, unperceived by Marie, who dreamt not of the archives lab as of her young hostess. Often, indeed, Marie beheld the trophies of Monoma's hunting exploits in the soft skins of beaver which lined the hut, as well as the many wild birds and other game upon which her returning appetite feasted deliciously. But little did Marie know of the really perilous as well as difficult expeditions which Monoma undertook, nor know that the Indian maiden's hands had worked the ground and gathered the maize of which was reade the excellent succotash which tempted her palate in the mornings.

Thus months were away-summer passed, and the gloneus Indian-summer followed with its gorgeous train or glowing Bansets, cloudless skies, and moonlit nights of dazzung brit liancy. Need was there now for Monoma to exert all her skill and energy in taking advantage of the proper hunting season in order to lay in store of Good for the winter's consumption; for well she knew the glorious autumnal noons would be succeeded by storms and snows, when her islet-home would be barricaded by great drit's, and the great bay waters congealed, so that no fish could be taken by her weak hands, and when, maybap, for months, naught would be heard in the wilderness but the howl of wolves and panthers ravenous for prey. All this Monoma knew, and, hopeless of her father's return, she prepared to exert herself to the utmost in providing the lodge with stores of game, and corn and other necessaries, by means of which the winter might be passed in something like comfort; for she felt that Marie was ill-calculated to bear privation, and resolved, with generous courage, that no want of her friend should be unsupplied which her devotion might anticipate.

Thus, indeed, Monoma exposed herself to many risks which she might otherwise have avoided; and thus it happened, one lonely starlit night, as she eagerly pursued a wild fawn over hill and through dale, the dauntless maiden found herself suddenly checked by the ominous growl of a panther, which, crouching on the gizantic bough of an oak immediately in her path, was prepared to spring upon her as she passed.

Maric, at the fearful sight, would have fainted and been devoured in an instant. Monoma was of a different mould, and, morsover, accustomed to will emess-perils. She, therefore, as her quick eye caught sight of the crouching panther, manifested no symptom of alarm, but quietly swerved from the direction in which she was bounding, and sprung for the chalter of another tree at a few paces listance. She was thus by the anger of the animal, which, baulked in its first design, hastened, by leaping to another tree, to gain a position where

21

SI

t!

U

M

U

d

it could pounce upon the anticipated victim.

The Indian girl, far from giving way to despuir, coolly place I an arrow in her bow and let it fly at the animal, just as it made a farious spring toward her. The shaft entered one of the panther's eyes, so truly was it aimed. The beast fell short of the maiden, who advoidly slipped around the great tree.

The wood resounded with the horrible cry of the panther, as, terribly galled by the shaft which still stuck in his bleeding eye, he cashed with terrible force at the tree where Monoma stool. It seemed as if the noble Indian girl must fall at once a victim to the ferocious animal.

Providence, however, had ordered otherwise, and, in this great strait, sent an unlooked for deliverance; for, in the moment when she herself believed no hope remained, a loud shout was heard alone beside her. A man sprung forward, ran bobily at the punther, striking it full in the breast, and be ring its ponderous body against the tree, within a foot of Maroma herself. At the same moment another figure emerged from the thicket and advanced toward the tree.

"Well, Robin Ball, have you settled him?" demanded the new-corner, in a voice which made the heart of Monoma leaps in her breast, for it spoke in the French tongue, and was perfectly intelligible to her.

"Mass! St. Elmo! but I think he is done for!" was the 'eply of Robin Ball, as he shook the dead panther from the neavy pike of St. Elmo.

"Let us see, then, what manner of being you have rescued from the ferocious beast," said St. Elmo, stepping forward, while Monoma threw herself at the feet of R bin Ball, and, in her sweet accents, thanked him in excellent French for his timely action which had saved her life.

Had some visitant dropped from the skies, Robin and St. Elmo could not have been more astonished than they were now, to hear the foreign language spoken by an Indian Diana, who had just narrowly escaped death from an American tiger. It was not, therefore, to be marveled at, that they both present

ently plied the young huntress with questions, or that they speedily learned of the relationship in which Monoma stood to the white race. On his part, feeling instinctively that he might trust the red maiden, St. Elmo informed her that himself and companion had dwelt for several months in a covern bard by, where they had stored provisions and furm, the sprids of their chase in the surrounding wilds. Much Monoma wondered that she had never before encountered the white hunters, but the circumstance was accounted for by the fact, that they had roamed the forest with great caution, never venturing far from their retreat, lest they should meet and be taken captive by savages, many bands of whom, at divertimes, they had seen traversing the wilderness.

But, what was Gabriel St. Elmo's surprise and joy, where Monoma informed him that one of his countrywomen had survived the wreck, and that the name of that one was Marie. The youth was nearly will with delight, and implored to be conducted at once to Marie, and testified such ardent emotion, repeating over and over the French mailen's name, that Monoma at once, with a woman's tact, perceived the relation of the youth to her fair young friend.

51

n,

0

36

31

0

All this time Robin Bill had remained gazing upon her sweet countenance, with a stare of blank wonder. So royal in her will lending garb, yet, without, so gentle and engaging did Monoma appear to the rude English seaman, that he could find no words which he deemed suitable to address her in reply to the gratitude that she had expressed for his apportune gervice; and it was not till, in answer to St. Elmo's earnest prayer to be conducted to Marie, and Monoma had stepped forward to lead the way, that Robin could collect his faculties sufficiently to withdraw his gaze from her. Then, heaving a sigh, which seemed to shake his great heart, and wiping on the grass the bloody pike with which he had shain the panther, Robin Ball followed St. Elmo and the Indian maiden away from the glen, in the direction of Tisquentam's wigwam.

fro

YOU

of

ha

₫(

11. (

ai

30

10

ti

D

7

C

CHAPTER XIV.

THE SANOP OF THE DEAD.

A courtary Indian stood upon a lofty rock that frowned over the shores of the Connecticut, near the mouth of that beautiful river. His arms were crossed upon his broad bosom, and his tall form, towering in loneliness upon the ridge of the precipiee, seemed like a statue wrought from the rock itself. It was Mattakan, the Perpod chieftain. He was not alone. Roposing at the base of the rock, concealed in its shadow, lay nine swarthy sons of the forest, savages of the Perpod nation. They were the war-brethren of Mattakan, and sworn avengers of the Indian's wrongs.

Huny moons had come and flitted since Outesie had been shin, with her babe in her arms. During these months Mattakan had neither crossed the threshold of his council-lodge, nor joined in hunt or war-expedition. But away from his tribe, along the shores of the big waters, and to the settlements of the pale-faces on the great Hudson, had the chieftain wandered, to behold the stranger-ships as they came from the great ocean. Mattakan nursed but one image in his memory—the form of the white man who had shain Outesie; he nursed but one desire—for vengeance on the murderer of his wife.

The chieftain's deserted wigwam mouldered in the forest; his babe pined among the Pequod squaws; but Mattakan beheld it not, till at length the child sickened and died. Then the father took it from his village, and buried it with Outesie, in the lonely grave beneath the oak tree. But Mattakan spoke big words no more in the councils of his tribe, nor smoked with the ancient braves, nor hearkened to the songs of Pequod maids. The life of his heart was no more; he had buried it with Outesie and her child.

But, ever and anon, when the wandering chiestain returned from afar, he whispered low words to the brethren of his youthful days, and they bent their ears, listening to the tale of the white man's wrong, and then, grasping each others' hands, swore by the Great Spirit that they would revenge the death of Outesie. Then Mattakan and his nine war-brethren went forth from their nation, and roamed among other tribes, and afar to the white settlements, seeking evermore the murderer; till at length the pale-taces grew fearful at the dark looks of that Pequod band, and the white squaws hushed their children with the name of Mattakan, the Sanop of the Dead.

ned

has om,

the

elf.

ne.

lay

)II.

erg

en

t.

C, ig

4

13

But Mattakan warred not against the innocent pale-faces who dwelt near the great sea, nor against those whose lodge-fires smoked in the forests. He waited in patience to discover the slayer of Outesie, for the Great Spirit had talked to him in dreams, and promised that he should one day stand face to face with his enemy. So Mattakan waited for revenge.

Nor, in good sooth, was the time far distant when the wronged ludian was to encounter his desperate foeman; for Captain Pierre was even then not far from the shores whither the Pequal war-brethren had followed their leader. The brigantine had, it is true, pursued her expedition, and the place of Lopez, the Spaniard, had been speedily filled by another of the reckless crew, after which, for some months, they cruised upon the main; till at length it chanced that in an attack which Captain Pierre made upon the Spanish boats near Carasson, he encounterd a resistance totally unlooked for and, though the pirates succeeded in capturing the trading boats, with a great store of nacrchandise, yet their own numbers were so thinnel in the fight, that it became necessary for the Creole to retrace his course, and steer for some point where he could recruit the ban I. He dured not enter Curasgon, or St. Thomas, near by, neither to venture to the main coast opposite since many of those Spaniards who manned the mercleant-houts had escape! from the combat, and the rover feared would give the glarm to men-of-war of their own country; in which case his own vessel might be shortly captured, and his own career ended on the scaffold. So, Captain Pierre deemed it his wisest course to shape at once for the north shores of America, and strive for recruits among ever to the thements of Virginia or Hadson's river, where, he doubted Lot, many testies spirits were to be found, discusted with the involving of the creative at the property of Walter Ruleich and the other Ruleich and the other Ruleich and the other Ruleich and the other Ruleich and the creative I have been into Hadson's waters, at the moment that Mattakan, his enemy, was tarrying with his comrades at the mouth of the river Connecticut. Won from are the dispositions of Providence, which, when even known not, are working to the good and evil of mankind, according as their deserts determine.

It was near eventile when Captain Pierre's vessel passed around the long island which by at the entrance of the waters upon whose banks a few huts and a trading stockade, planted by Hollanders, marked the small beginnings of what was hereafter to grow into the great commercial metropolis of the New World. The rover had, indeed, steered for the Virginia coast; but, miscalculating his neighborhood, had run around the rocky capes at the northward, and found himself at night near the waters claimed by Dutch setders. Accordingly he resolved to visit them, and perhaps, after a profitable trade of his plundered cloths for beavers and other fars, to finish the expedition by another foray for shaves among the aborigines.

But the evening approached while yet the brigantiao sounded through the unknown channel which she had entered, and, as the sky gave no promise of a moonlit night, but rather wore a murky and musurd hae, the buccuneer resolved to cast anchor in the shelter of a jutting point, near which emptied into the sea a wide river, evidently rising far inland. So, when the evening grew darker, the shallop role at anchor upon the channel's edge, her trim hull motionless, and searcely definable as it swayed sluggishly with the tide. One dim lantern hung over the bows, its flickering rays revealing a swivel-gun there mounted; but all portions of the bright time were wrapped in the increasing obscurity of the night.

But, though the weather's aspect was gloomy and unpromtsing, no sign of approaching tempest was observable; rather, it seemed, that a sluggish calm had drepped over land and wate and and atmosphic teso ques

100

the for the and say

as k: th

da

23

ti ti

C

water—one of those sultry calms, when life seems to stagnate, and all nature yields to apathy. Nevertheless, Captain Pierre and his reckless crew seems I little influenced by the heavy atmosphere, but, as they gathered with song malipit in the roundhouse of the brigantine, and quaffed deeply of Junios spirits, sweetened with the case of St. Enstatia, appeared resolved on maintaining the signalness of the favorite though a restionable more dity contained in one of their delaking 20032:

"Nor care nor fear hath the bold buccaneer,
The headsman's stall he troubleth not—
Ee keepeth his prayer till he swings i'the air—
For he'll need it then if at all, God wot."

But better had it been for that roystering company had they watched with fear and care in those unknown waters; for they had then beheld, perchance, the dusky human form that swam cariously about the shallop, and climbed to the anchor cable; and they had most, perhaps, the glare of those savage eyes which, through the open window of the roundhouse, looked in on them with omigous glare, fixed upon the dark features of the Creole captain with a look of hate, deally as the fascination of a serpent.

But no saspicion crossel the dranken minds of the rovers as they plied their cars, and bundled jest and song. Mattaken, the Pequel, maked well the marker of his wife, and then, noiselessly as he had come, assembled from the cable, and clove his way to shore beneath the salary cloud that concealed the water like a pall.

. 4

oty

10

1')

6.

13

19

12-

10 ij-

ç.

ir

d

Par into the night extended the revels of the bree meers their house laughter mocking the solemn stillness of nature—the ominous unnatural stillness of all things else. Throughout that sultry night the waters remained sluggish and dark, not a breath of air rippling their surface, not a passing zephyr Lapping the listless canvas. Metionless the brigantiae lay upon the midnight sea.

On the shore, likewise, brooded a similar stillness. Then then the gray marking gray of the of leading, no hands are seen to bear away the clouds; the birds remained adent, or dropped from their tree-top nests to the ground, or wheeled above in slow, bewildered circles. The quiet over nature's thee appeared, indeed, like the quiet of death, for it was that quiet prequant with presentiment—the quiet that presages the earthquake's approach.

the

dea

the

egi

COL

alo

an 377 ho

W

m

CI

91

V

h

3

t

h

11

I

The tradition that tells of this first strange convulsion of asture known to New-England chronicles, is almost lost in the mazy history of two hundred and forty years. Still, in a few legetels preserved in the white man's books, and more vividly in the unwritten stories still rife among the remnant of Eastern tribes, it yet lives—descending by the mouths of cle men, who relate it in the language of their fathers-how the big waters upswelled, and then subsided into dead calmness, how the voice of Maniton was heard in the heavens, and from the woo l-depths and caverns the wild breath of Hobbomocke replied to him; how the rel-man's corn was uptorn, and their Iwellings made like cances to swim upon the swollen waters; 10W hundreds and thousands of trees were uproofed—tall oaks and walnuts blown from their places, and wound up like withes by the hurricane; and how, at last, the moon shrouded her face in the great darkness which followed, and medicinemen shuddered, and soothsayers prophesied the doom of the Indian. The tradition yet lives of all this, though the historian scarce notices date or event.

Matakan, as his stately form towered loftily amid the nine Pequod war-brethren, and his straining eyes watched the breaking of night's shadows around, could behold a heavy black cloud hanging like a pall over the I road mouth of Connecticut river—making darkness from the heavens to the ocean; and he knew that within the bosom of this cloud lay the brigantine of the pale-faces. Descending to the riverbank, followed by his Pequod braves, he pointed toward the spot, and then silently took his station in the prow of a canoe, which, though apparently so slight that a child's finger might rock it, was yet of capacity sufficient to accommodate the ten Indians. Quickly a dozen paddles dashed aside the waters, though their plash was almost noiscless, and the dark birchen vessel shot out upon the wide river, unnoticeable in the thick gleom.

After at the east stretched a sickly yellow line, marking the struggling break of day; but in the west, the ominous cloud mingled with a dense fog that arose from the river. Ellently, and shrouded in the mist, crept the Pequod's came toward the hidden shallop of the stranger; while still the solemn and deathlike apathy brooded over the life of all things else, and the terrible immobility of nature was unbroken by breath or agitation.

h

tc

14

13

P

1

i.

Meanwhile, Captain Pierre and his reveling companions continued unwearied their night's orgies. The Creole held aloft his forming goblet, and trolled a reckless distich, while and the laugh of his crew echoel the drunken strain. watchmen on the brigantine's deck drew near to the roundhouse, joining in the mirth of their comrades, or exchanging with them some covert jest. But Captain Pierre, as he thus made merry on these strange waters, did not remember the crimes that gathered darkly behin! him during the five moons since he had arrived in the French ship, off the headlands of Wollocar-did not recall his cruel desertion of the emigrants, his cold-blooded murder of the Indian wife, his attempted assassination of Robin Ball, and the kidnapping of Tisquontam and the red children. Yet, though all these wicked deels had been committed within the space of a single summer, and near the spot where his bark now rode at anchor, Captain Pierre little dreamed that his presence had been traced with the unerring cunning of a savare, or that his revels that night were watched by Mattakan, avenger of the murdered Outesic. So he drank and reveled with his rover-crew.

What plash was that beside the anchore I shallop? What shadows were those which stole silently up the cables, and crouched in the shadow of the galley? The deal quiet remained unbroken by the watchman's alarm—naught had been seen by his drunken eyes.

What glimmer, as of angry eyes, was that which sublenly intercepted the lantern-rays? The watch beheld it not, yet it marked the stealthy progress of Mattakan and his braves, as thouly and silently, they crept toward the round-house, and drew near to the careless sentinels.

A wild yell rung upon the sluggish air, and then a shout, like the war-cry of demons; then followed a struggle, a groan, and the watchmen were hurled backward upon the shallop's deck, their foreheads red with the mark of tomahawks.

The revelers in the round-house sprung appalled to their wet. They beheld, crouching at the door, a half-dozen red foes

nex

rou

fore

me

Ma

ane

the de

th

th

bl

87

11

15

t

1)

men, and heard the Pequod war-whoop pealing through the brown tine. And, foremost of the yelling savages, his wild to a scoking but one object, Captain Pierre beheld Mattakan. The Creobe instructly recognized the stately warrior whom he had once seen upon the shores of Massachusetts bay; and at the state instant the chieftain's eyes encountered the shaper of his loved Oatesie. He had tracked the murderer to his lair, and the outh sworn at the grave of his wife would now be fulfilled. Many moons had Mattakan waited for this hour; it had come at last!

Captain Pierre's quick glance ranged over the dark faces classering around the Pequod chieftain, and then fell upon his own few men. The savages outnumbered the pale-faced crew, but what recked the bucconcer of that? He knew that his own stalwart arm and iron blade could sweep a red-man to the deck with a single blow, and his firearms were all within reach. Yet, he paused a moment, dropping the point of his railed sword, and waving his hand, as if to invoke parley—

"Brothers!" he then said, in a low voice.

But Mattakan's brow grew dark as midnight.

"Outesie!" he cried in answer, and, springing back from the round-house door, seized a pine-knot from one of his savage companions, and then, plucking a hatchet from his wan pun-belt, broke the glass that protected the binnack-lamp, while a yell of the Pequo is, and a sudden rush of all toward the round-house, cast the white men at once upon their defense.

But Captain Pierre, as he beat back the first Indian who alvanced, kept his eyes fixed upon the motions of Mattakan, and beheld the chief ignite the resinous wood which he held, and then, as its blaze streamed wildly out, cast it among the cordage and sails that flapped heavily against the masts of the brightnee. In an instant a become of flame swept the rigging and overspread the deck as with a woof of fire, while beneath, the red and white combatants confronted each other, their wild countenances illumined by the light that streamed far across the gloomy waters. With foot advanced, and hatchet brandished above his head, pressed Mattakan in their midst, and opposing him, with bronzed brow shining in the red gleam, stood his enemy, the Creole. It was but for one moment, however, that the antagonists thus remained; the next, attering a fierce yell, the Peauols mingled with their foes.

Captain Pierre cast his back against the solid lockers of the round-house, and with a sweep of his heavy sword struck the foremost Indian bleeding to the deck. Then, white and red met, and presently interlocked in furious struggles for mastery Mattakan, the Sanop of the Dead, sprung before his brethren, and hurled his tomahawk at the captain's forchead. It struck the iron blade of the Creole's sword, and fell barmless to the deck. Instantly the Pequol had grappled his foe.

But what meaneth that dismal shiver of the waters around the brigantine? Whence that moaning rash of wind through the forests that skirt the river's mouth? Truly doth the black cloud that filled the heavens now sink suddenly down, swallowing the yellow line of morning.

The earthquake ! the hurricane !

16

7

11,

16

11

f

Γ,

6

It rushed suddenly from the forest-caves—it swept up from the river's mouth—it fell darkly from the heavens—at once, and terribly.

The waves uprose like a boiling caldron—the water rocked to and fro, and the slight vessel was lifted in the air. Her masts grouned and snapped; the burning sails streamed afar like banners of fire. Then came a shock, a heaving swell, a horrible crash around the entire horizon; then a hundred lightnings leaped from the sable cloud, while the roaring of multitudinous thun lers seemed blent in the one fierce throb of earth, sea, and sky.

The hatchets of the Indians fell upon the bloody deck, and their fingers loosed the gripe of quivering scalps. The white men likewise paused, affrighted at the new and supernatural peril which threatened them.

In a moment the stroke of the hurricane fell, and the brigantine rolled over in the trough of the sea. The swelling waters mounted in an immense wave, and swept her decks of red-men and pale-faces; the hurricane clove her like the sudden sweep of a sworl, and, ere a cry of horror could be raised, the grappling combatants were nurled into the black waters.

thi

80 tw

of 31

E

CHAPTER XV.

THE FRENCH PASSENGER AND HIS HISTORY.

directed stroke of a dagger aimed at his heart; to be compelled to fight for life against four stalwart pirates; to plunge headlong into the ocean, grasping the throat of an assassin—are experiences well calculated to damper the energy of any man; therefore the French passenger of the brigantine, when he rose from under the water where he had sunk with Lopez the Spaniard, was, as may be imagined, in no comfortable frame of mind. Nevertheless, it behoved him to strike out for immediate safety, though the night was dark as Erebus. Neither the brigantine could be seen nor the pirate whom he had grappled with, and the brave man swam lustily for a few moments; then, becoming somewhat freed from his bewilderment, floated for a few moments upon his back, reflecting on his novel situation.

The Frenchman was not unused to adventure, nor, as he had assured Captain Pierre, unacquainted with har ships; yet the predicament in which he now discovered himself decidedly transcended in interest all his previous experiences. But, at the moment he was debating the chances of his surviving long enough affoat to become a living meal for the sharks that infested those latitudes, the sudden contact of his limbs with a floating object startled his thoughts. Striking out his hands, be immediately felt a fragment of wood, which he at once concluded was a piece of the taffrail that, in breaking, had precipitated himself and the Spaniard into the ocean. Scarcely had he grappled with what promised to assist him to sustain himself, when he heard a feeble voice near him cry:

"St. Dominic preserve me! it is he!"

[&]quot;Hah?" cried the Frenchman, "is this my caitiff antagonist? Truly, we are both at even chances for life! Ho, friend! art not drowned yet?"

"Mercy!" gasped the trembling voice of Lopez, sounding through the darkness in the ear of his intended victim; for, so dense was the black fog which enveloped the sea, that the two men, though clinzing to extremities of the same fragment of tofficial, were yet unable to discern one another. "Wo must die—we must drown!"

"Speak for yourself, my good fellow," returned the Frenchman. "For my part, I intend to live as long as I can, and co I shall stick to this bit of wood, advising you to do the same.".

"Are you not about to cast me off from this frail support?"

"I have as much as I can do, good fellow, to keep my own grasp, without troubling myself about easting off a fellow-creature. There is support for both, as it chances, so I counsely you to hold on fast."

" St. Dominie reward you !" murmured the Spaniard. "But -alas! I see no way of escape!"

rio

m

194

]--

ny

en

02 ila

ngt.

13.

18

W

T.

111

10

19

y

11

3

ii

8

9,

8

1

u

"Truly, one must have better eyes than mine to see at all,"
said the other mun. "Nevertheless, morning can not be far away, and meantime we are in no great peril, the sea being so calm. Therefore say your prayers, good fellow, and ask St. Dominie to forgive you for the grievous crime that you would have perpetrated."

Lopez grouned, and presently began to implore the mercy of all the saints in his calendar, at the same time venting not a few maledictions upon Captain Pierre, whom he charged with all the responsibility of his own sins. But the Frenchman gave little heed to the wretch's aljarations, being himself intently watching for the streaks of day, which at length began to dissipate the mist that shrouled the occan. At first, indeed, he could distinguish nothing save the sea; but as the dull, gray light broadened by degrees above the gazer's vision, he could discern the outlines of a shore at the leeward, to which appearently the taffrail was drifting. At the same time the Frenchman's regards fell upon the face of Lopez tha Epiniard, now revealed in the dim atmost here, as he dlung at the other end of the farment of wood. It was glastly and fear-stricken, and the fixed eyes almost glared in returning the look they met.

"Well, comrade! what think you now of our causes?"

tu

81

h

be

W

10

2

£

8

ti

0

cried the Frenchman, in a cheery tone, willing, if possible, to raise the spirits of his wretched fellow-sufferer. "Mark you you had, to which we drift fast? God's mercy has preserved to be the and it is meet that we should be grateful?"

Mary! mutered Lagra, in a despending voice. "God's rerry is not for the Jones. But you, Monsieur, whom I would thin have shins do you pardon me in truth?"

'As treely as I trest in pardon myself for manifold transgrations,' answered the Frenchman. "But now, lest the sea may specify clob from the land, and thus bear us away, I pray you strike out listly, and let us swim together, push ing this tathail withal. Thus shall we reach the shore and be safe."

"Heaven help me! I fear I shall ne'er put foot on shore again," groaned the Spaniard. "Neither can I strike out not swim, for strength nor skill have I in the water. St. Dominic be my witness, I can but hold fast to the wood."

"Hold fast, then, in God's name!" answered the Frenchman. "I will strive if mine own limbs can force forward both you and the taffrail."

So saying, the bold swimmer forced the taffail forward toward the shore. Lopez hung a dead weight upon it. Thus, by dint of the Frenchman's exertions assisting the drift, they approached the land, which appeared to be a small island, until the white study of the shore could be plainly discerned all among through the transparent waves. Already the swimmer had slackened his efforts, sure that the goal would be easily attained; already Lopez began to hope, when saddenly, immediately from the bright sands beneath, arose the form of an enormous ground-shark. Turning, as it ascended, it presented to view its white belly, which flashed like silver in the clear waters.

The ground-shark, infesting the tropical seas, is the deadliest of its kind, being poisonous as well as ferocious, and, unlike the more timid follower of ships, can not be frightened away blows or splinting of the wayes. As this dreadful fish increase visible, the Prenchman, as he awam, crish loudly to his companion:

"A shark-have a care Leave the wood and make for

Then, with a generous thought to save the Spaniar I, ha turned the taffrail about, so that Lopez was near the sands and might easily seruntile into shoal-water. But Heaven half ordained that the wretch should perish, as he expected before reaching the land; for la persisted in ciliraina to the would, as it were, fearing to making an effort to gain in the l ife, the Frenchman no longer held to the boar le, L. t s.t ck iff, and presently reached the shore. Then, easting his eyes about, he beheld the spectacle he fear i to encennter-an agonized face appearing a moment beside the taliral, then another wild leap upward of the Spiniarl's mingled body, as the teeth of the shark cut him in twain, his life-blood graning out on the waters, which it discolored even to the pebbly beach. This was the end of Lopez the Spaniard, who had been spared from the ocean only to meet a doom more fearful, in punishment of his wicked life. The Frenchman felt unbounded gratitude to the gracious Providence which had preserved him from the fate of his companion.

"See, now," he murmured, "how inscrutable are the mercies of Almighty Wisdom! Had not you taffrail become broken off, in my struggle on board the brigantine, we had not fallen into the deep, it is true, but I should assure lly have been slain by those despera loes who sought my life. Then, had not the wretch grasped the wood, and thus floated it, unknowingly, near where I swam, peralversure I had soon become exhausted, and sunk in the sea! And now, at the last, I am save I by the sacrifice of this unhappy man; for it is plain that the fish would have made a meal of me, had not the other been there! Truly, wondrous are thy ways, oh gord I"

Thus the Frenchman communed, as he walked along the beach from which the tile was now claims, as he bed expected, leaving bure the white such where so latery rail hin in amoush the deally grown black. By what we star turprise and joy to discover, just as the month or sun ind partly broken over the ocean, irradiating every object, that a large ship was in sight, apparently stan ling in fall sail toward the island.

This joyful sight renewed the prayers and thanksgivings of

in die

clo

dia

the

tio

pu

gi

fri

15

81

th

11 ta

81

11

F

the Frenchman, who impatiently ran back and forth upon the shore, displaying a flag which he made with his torn doubles and shirt, and shouting at the top of Lislum's so soon as he deemed the vessel to be within hailing distance. Presently ha became aware that his presence upon the island but been discoverel, for soon a boot was seen to leave the ship and shape its course for the beach. In a little time, much to his satisfaction, the Frenchman trod the decks of a first-class galleon of England, bound homeward from the New World with cargo of fish and beaver-skins, in all near ten thousand pounds, and of great value. To the master of this calleon the Frenchtirus made known Lis wonderful adventure and deliverance. From the English mariner he received all friently consolation and assurance of future safety, and presently stipulated with the worthy captain to carry him as passenger to a port in Britain. The Frenchman was far from being destitute of me ins wherewith to bargain for his voyage to England; for closely sewn in the girdle beneath his doublet, were store of diamonds and other precious stones, worth even more than the strong pox which he had left on board the brigantine. These valuables, however, the Frenchman still concealed, only bargaining with the English master to reward Lim for his sindness when the ship should arrive at her destined port.

At this port, in time, the galleon arrived. And when the edventurer lead once more set foot on land, and generously renumerated the master for all the attentions shown him on the passage, he went about among the smaller shipping, to engage some craft wherein he might immediately set out for his native France.

"For since I have been preserved through many years of har I hip, and escaped divers perils, so that I now return with store of this world's goods, obtained by hawful toil and profit, it now appeareth to me that Heaven, in its goodness, bath determined on my future happiness, and union with my dearest family! I will hasten, therefore, to lovely France, trusting still in the good Gol who has ever been my support."

Thus the pious Frenchman talked to himself, as he sought among the mariners for one that could convey him to France. What was his surprise, as he stood upon one of the quays, to be greeted in his native language by a dark-looking man, clad in sailor's garb, who came toward him with an air at once dignified and deferential, and, removing his coarse hat, disclosed a face which he fancied familiar, yet could not immediately recall to memory.

"The white chief does not remember the poor Ladian. But the Indian never forgets his friend!"

These words at once brought to the Frenchman's recollection the scene upon the shore at the Havana, when he had purchased a red-man from the brutal Captain Pierre, and given him to the protection of an English merchant-captain.

"Ah! I now remember you well! and your worthy master

-where is he?"

the

bles

e il e

1.0

11.50

स्माध

119-

603 ds

ch-

CC.

on ith

in

of

or

of an 10, ly

ily

he

ly

n

to

H

f

h

t,

h

14

5

h

"Tisquontam has no master. The white chief is his friend," returned the red-man, proudly, as, turning, he made way for the merchant-skipper of the Havana, who now approached and grasped the Frenchman's hand.

In a few moments the latter related to the Englishman alt that he had endured since parting from him in the New World, and in return was informed that the Indian Tisquontam had proved himself a very valuable acquisition to the ship's company, and won the good wishes of all the crew. He was not considered as a servant or slave, the customs of England repudiating the latter condition, at least at home, and the native dignity of the red-man making it impossible for a noble mind to treat him otherwise than with respect. Tisquontam, indeed, bore himself with much freedom and discretion, and endeavored in every manner to testify his gratitude to the Frenchman who had befriended him.

"The white chief," he said, alluding to the merchantcaptain, "will soon take Tisquontam back to his huntinggrounds, to the lodge where his gaughter mourns her lost father. There Tisquontam will remember his French brother, and Monoma shall pray for the chief who rescued her father from the man-stealer."

"I am gird that my red brother remembers his frient," answered the Frenchman. "Let him wear this to his lodge, and present it to his young squaw."

Saying this, he took a ring of plain gold from his finger, and placed it in the red-man's hand.

Tisquontam's noble features were agitated with emotion.

He seized the hand of his frient and raiset it to his lips. Then, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he thrust his hand into his bosom and drew forth a small golden cross. It was the teken which Marie de Luzerne had given him to here to had been kidnapped by the rufflan Creok.

OT

life

kin

DI

fit

W

ex

fat

30 to

lii

111

L

())

dì

h

H

tl

0

3

Ð,

0

"Here," cried the Indian, "Tisquontam has maught but this. He will tell the white bird that he gave it to a chief of her nation, his friend and brother, and she will—"

The relimin paged in sadden alarm as his glance : ested upon the tace of the Frenchman, who had seized the cross and was holding it extended at arm's length, his eyes fixed upon the cipher which, as we have before noticed, was engraven upon the small relic that Marie had inherited from her departed mother. His check grew finshed and pale by turns, his bosom heaved, and all his limbs were agitated as with violent emotion. Clasping his hands wildly together, he exclaimed:

"Tis hers-'tis hers i"

"The white-bird-Marie!" cried the Indian, as if intuitively following the other's thoughts.

"Ay! Marie - Marie! Whence came this cross? Long years ago I gave it to my lost wife. How is it I find it in the hands of an Indian? Speak, Tisquontam! who and what are you? How came you by this relic?"

Then gravely, but with minute accuracy, the Indian related all the circumstances connected with his possession of the cross—the fearful wreck of the emigrant-ship—the massacre and captivity of its survivors—his recene of Marie de Luzerne, and the subjequent adventure through which he had been derrived of his own liberty. The Frenchman listened, transfixed with astonishment, till Tisquontum concluded the recital. Then, falling on his knees, and raising his hunds, which still chaped the golden cross, he soknowledged an ewithe winderful power and benevolence of the Almighty Ruler of hundar events.

"O Father of Mercies!" he cried, "I thank Thee for this new work of Thy watchful providence—Thy protecting wisdom! Behold, through this savage, whem I but kindly treated in a small thing, Thou hast chosen to manifest Thy life! O Holy One, I thank Thee for all Thy wonderfus kindness, and may all my future life be witness to Tag praises!"

1

8

)

3

3

It was indeel the Sieur de la Lazerne, the long-about fither of Louis and Marie, who had returned to the Old World enriched, it is true, by toil and a lventure during his exite, but yet weighed down with solicitude concerning the fate of his funity, from whom he had been parted for so many years. His sentence of banishment, after having doomed him to an unjust expatriation from France, during the prime of his life, hel at list been reversed by the successor of the monarch whose misjudging severity had indicted it, and the fileur Luzerne leastened at once his return to his native bend, to seek out, if they were still living, the objects of his affection. But, alas! ill-fitted would have been his quest, disuppointed his hopes, had not the chance-meeting with Tisquontum, at the Havana and in Eaglial, revealed to him want no other thus the Indian could have told - the fite and adding-place of his orphaned children. Reason, in leed, had the exile to be thankful for Heaven's kindness, and cause enough to admire that wonder-working Providence which had permitted the Iroquois to be torn from his deaghter and his home, an order that through his instrumentality another sun level family might be reunited. Tisquontam and the English capatin, as well as Luzerne, joined in acknowledgment of the Divine Power, and together, with solemn steps, they wented their way to the British galleon which was soon to sail again for the Colonies, and in which the French exile restive lat once to return in search of his beloved children.

It was not long before, with the Iropiois at his sib, its Sieur de la Lazerne stood upon the decas of the English in a rad bade adien to the white shores of Albinia's a continue fits vessel clove her way once more a rass to white Arbert

CHAPTER XVI.

CAPTAIN PIERRE AND THE AVENGER.

In the darkness that succeeded the stroke of the hurricant, two stalwart forms arose in the boiling surf, and, unseen by each other, breasted the billows, as they struck vigorously for the thore. These were Mattikan, the Pequod, and the Creole, Captain Pierre. They did not see one another, for the hurricane's devastating track, bowed down over the waters and land in an impervious bank of mist.

Though appalled at the terrible manifestation of nature's power that had interrupted his work of vengeance, Mattakan plied his strong limbs in the effort to keep affoat, though his eyes were blinded by the spray, and his ears stunned by the roar around him, mingled with terrific noises from the land to which he sought to swim—the crack of whole forests snapping like reeds before the ponderous force of the typhoon.

He reached, at length, a point of elevated earth, that once hal marked the extremity of the river's banks; but in vain did the chief now search for a landing-place. Water was all around and before him-water, black and gloomy as the grave, stretchel für on either side. Mattakan then knew that the river had overflown its boundaries, inundating the forests and Lelds. The quick instinct of his savare nature taught him the course of safety. He struck billy forward for the hills which Lee knew could not be very far away. After a fearful struggle for life, his eyes were gladdened with the sight of land, and he was soon under the shelter of a friendly slore. What & seene of devastation met his view! Everywhere a wide wasto et waters-trees uptorn, deep channels cut in the land by the earthquake's mighty shock! Far away on the bosom of the will waters rode the shallop—a mere wreck of its former Leauty, and her decks silent as the stars in midnight.

Indian sat down to contemplate the fearful change which had so suddenly taken place, and mourned inwardly that his companions should all have been lost ere their venueance was consummated by the tomphawk and scalping-knife.

Mattakan sought a brief rest in repose, for his powerful frame was well nigh prostrate from his great exertion. He slept peacefully for an hour. When he awoke it was still dark, but to his surprise he found that the ship had been driven into shore by the return tide, and was now lying stranded at the river's edge.

The Pequod's keen glance explored in an instant every thing within its range, and noticed, what a white men might have passed unbeeded, that there were signs of life about the versel. Hastily plunging beneath the water's surface, he swam silently past the dismantled shallop, and, gaining a clamp of trees which commanded a view of her decks, concealed himself among the leaves, patiently awaiting the setting in of night.

The shades deep med. Sky, forest and water darkened into indistinctness, but the Pequod's watcht if eye was fixed upon the billionatine, till at length it marked a filmy's noke minuting with the gloom above her decks, and then a sudden light gleaming through the window of the round-house. No human form appeared, yet Mattakan knew that some living being was there. Cautiously leaving his hiding-place, he swam to the bluff, and noiselessly climbed his way to the vessel's deck. All was still as the grave, but the roys of light glimmaring from the round-house, guided the Indian's procress, as with wild-cat stealthiness he crawled along the slippery planks, and at length reached the gulley, close beside the hulf-open loor of the cabin, where, shrouded in darkness, he crouched low, and peered forward. What did Mattakan behold?

The numberer of his wife was there—the Croole, Captain Pierre; and he slept.

The rover and it is enemy, the Pequo I, were the sole survivors of that terrible tempest. Their companions, while are ited, had perished in the swollen waters, and only the two fees now met once more upon the decks of that fated batt.

Still the rover slept. An iron lamp barnel on the before him, and near it the Creole leaned, resting upon his folded arms, overpowered by the fitigues and perils of the day. His pistols, primed and loaded, lay beside the lamp.

Mattakan cautiously drew nearer to the door of the road house, and at last entered. Still the Creole remained motion less, and the Pequol crept on until he reached the table, and gird bling out his hand, seized the tirearms of his white enemy.

I

ė,

h

Įt

Vi

r

ti

10

It

8

N

P

fe

ta

ti

li

p

C

t

b

r

0

f

May inited, was the slaver of his who within the red-main tower. The manderer of Outsile was definished in the high. He remembered his wife and child, and their grave bet othe the oak tree, on the ber less of his native waters, and, raising the deadly weapon which he had grasped in his right hand, he pointed it at the white man's heart. But Mattakan could not slay a sleeping foe.

He strack the table with the iron muzzle of the pistol, and praced at the same instant the war-whoop of his race. Terribly rung that yell upon the still night-air, and was answered by the adarmed voice of Captala Pierre, startled from his stander. The rover sprung to his feet, and beheld his pistole in the hands of a red-man. He saw before him the Samop of the Deal, and heard one word attered by the Indian's lips:

" Outesie !"

The rover's check grew pale as he rolled his blood-shot eyes around the cabin, in the vain hope of escape. Still his craft did not forsake him. He knew something of the Indian language, as well as character, and at once essayed to parley.

"Is my red brother a warrior?" demanded he, in the dia lect used by the northern tribes.

"Our sie!" was the valien response of the chief.

"I am not armed," continued Chattam Pierre. "Will the brave slay a chained buffalo?"

"Mattakan will not slay his chained enemy."

"Then let us fight with knives," said the Creole.

"The place and hove a hope to Let bim be acred."

Be it so; we will then be even," said the rover. And, the pines has be spice, while the rate of the party he take the spice of the rate blooms. Within this case, or locker, were divers arms ranged upon a shelt and on the floor beneath, an iron bound keg, the lid of which had fallen off, and disclosed its contents. Mattakan shuddered as recognized in the open keg the white mar's thunder-seed

—d e terrible gunpowder of the pale-faces. But his inflexible Ind an visage exhibited no trace of what he observed. His eye calmly surveyed the Croole, who had grasped a brace of hunting-knives.

"Now I will fight the red chief?" cried Captain Pierre, 22 he extended one of the bright blades to Mattakan, who received it but with one response—"Outesie," and then flung the pistols which he held upon the deck behind him.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Captain Pierre, who had rightly reckoned on this magnatimous action of the red warrior; and then, quick as thought, he grasped a curbine which stood loaded within reach of his hand, and, springing back, leveled it at the Pequod's breast.

The white man's treachery had outwitted the simple Indian, and the Creole's mirth rung out in anticipated triumph. But Mattalan was cunning, and desperate as his foe.

For scarcely had the rover's laughter marked his sudden possession of the carbine, than the Pequod's hand was thrust forward, and grasped the iron lamp which burned upon the table. Captain Pierre divined his purpose, and snapped the trigger of the deadly weapon which he held, but it was too late. The red-man had hurled the burning lamp into the powder which had caught his quick eye.

A bright flash followed, a grash, and the rocking swell of crushed timbers. And then, fast and thick, upon the startled waters, the hill beyond, and the half-sunken trees, fell down the fragments of destruction. Fragments of the doomed brigantine rose into the gloomy air—then pattered on the river's face in terrible hail. And when the bright sun arose on the ensuing morn, gilding the turbid Connecticut, there floated from the silent river the mangled remains or two men, blackened, mutilated, and scorched by tare, yet in death they seemed to clutch each other, and interiock their limbs. They were Mattakan, the Sanop of the Dead, and his enemy. Captain Piérre.

The Pequod has avenged his Outesia.

11

B

€5

E.

n

i

I

V

8

k

b

th

1

8

h

li

n

8 tt

N

h

CLAPTER XVII.

FATHER AND CHILD.

When Monoma returned to her islet-lodge, accompanied by Robin Ball and Gabriel St. Elmo, Marie was sleeping upon her sylvan couch. Monoma would have approached her quietly, but St. Elmo's impatience could not be restrained. He rushed to the side of the slumbering girl, and, sinking on his knees, murmured her name. Marie started.

"St. Elmo!" she cried, and then, with a low cry, sunk back upon the couch.

"Oh, Father in Heaven! I have killed her!" cried the youth wildly, clasping the maiden's hands. But Monoma, with her gentle ministrations, was instantly at hand, and, under her care, Marie soon awoke again to animation. Nevertheless it was apparent that, in her weak condition, all under excitement was fraught with danger, and St. Elmo was accordingly banished immediately to the outer lodge which had been once used by Tisquontam. Here he bore patiently the reproaches of Robin Ball for his ill-alvised conduct in so rashly approaching the young invalid.

"An' it were Bob Ball," cried the bluff sailor, "no better rense could be expected. But for you, monsieur, to my mind it was a shame to frighten the poor young body so woundily."

"I know I am an ass—a brute—and worse than the Leathen savages themselves," returned St. Elmo, with perplexed contrition. "Dat, Robin Ball, when I looked upon that sweet maiden slumbering so quietly, I lost all thought save the desire to hear her voice in greeting of my poor name."

"And so you would fain frighten her into dumbness forever," quoth Rob Ball. "Beshrew me, but such things have been where the Christian's voice has been lost, only by reason of great alarm like that."

"Oh that I had heeded the counsel of the Indian girl?" cried St. Elmo, bitterly bemoaning his rashness. "She bade me take caution when I approached."

"Ah, indeed! what a princess is that?" exclaimed the Engäshman; "a gentle and comely maiden, with a step like a fawn, and movements as graceful as a dolphin. Oh, that a heather and should boast such a miracle of maiden beauty!"

"Hol' cried St. Elmo, smiling in spite of his previous alarm, at the sudden enthusiasm manifested by his comrade. "By St. Denis, you talk like an enamored swain, instead of Robin Ball."

"And if I be enamored of so dainty a damsel as you redekinned maid," answered the sailor, nothing daunted, "'twould not be the first of my land who wedded with a dusky princess. By my troth, but this huntress, or witch, or whate'er she be, is quite as comely as the queen Pocahontas, whom Master Rolfe brought to England with him, ere I set sail on my last voyage."

"She who saved the life of your countryman, Captain Smith," remarked St. Elmo.

d

17

B

d.

H

k

18

2

r-

18

1-11 0

0

T

d

C

1-11

16

X

4

3

IJ

"The same—a notable princess and daughter of a great king in the Virginia country," responded Robin Ball. "But, by my troth, monsieur, this witch o' th' woods would shame the Princess Pocahontas herself."

"She hath plainly bewitched thee, poor Robin," cried St. Elmo, as he rose quickly to greet the Indian girl, who now stepped lightly from the lodge. The sailor, on his part, became silent at once, contenting himself with following with his glances every motion of the graceful maiden.

Monoma soothed her protége to sleep once more, and commanded St. Elmo, with a sweet decision, that he should attempt no more rash surprises.

"Let the white braves now sleep!" said she pointing to a pile of soft skins which lay in a corner of the outer wigward. "To-morrow the white bird will sing in the cars of her friend"

And then, with a glance at St. Elmo, which told the youth that the shrewd maiden already guessed the secret of his love, Monoma bade the white man good-night. But long after she had departed, to watch beside Mary, Robin Ball, who immediately regained his ve' bility, kept himself and companion awake by converse concerning infidel princesses and Indiaa queens won by the valor of British adventurers, and leaving their heathen homes to dwell in the far-off "merrie England" of their bold overs.

On the following day Marie recovered from her agitation, rejoiced to meet the young companion of her ill-fated voyage, conversed long with St. Elmo, and listened with interest to the quaint sayings of Robin Ball. Very soon the two strangers became informed of all the generous treatment which the French girl had experienced at the hands of Tisquontam and his noble daughter, and how the Indian chief had disappeared so addenly, made prisoner, as was supposed, by white men; at which last piece of information Rob Ball broke out into a malediction against Captain Pierre Dacot.

"It was that villain who did the deed?" cried the Englishman. "Oh that I had his skull here to crack like a cocoanut with a good quarter-staff! Pray heaven we meet some time."

Robin Ball knew not that the Creole's brigantine was, at this very time, nearing the coasts of America, and that a focman keener for revenge than himself was waiting in prophetic anticipation of meeting the Creole murderer.

Several days passed, and Marie, whose health was nearly restored, and her spirits manifestly improved by intercourse with the admiring St. Elmo, who made no secret of his love for her, was able to wander forth, well clad with Monorea's beaver-mantle, for the air began now to grow chilly in the mornings and evenings, though the midday glowed with all the intensity of Indian summer's heat. But as the French girl's frame regained its buoyancy, her mind dwelt constantly upon her brother, who, she knew, was but a half-day's journey from the islet, but whose condition, whether happy or miserable, in health or sickness, was quite unknown to her. To behold her beloved Louis and the Abbe once more was now the constant desire of her heart, and Monoma at length proposed to set out for the Narragansett town, and, if possible, arrange a rendezvous where 'he captive brother might meet his sister, mourned as dead, but in reality so near to him. Robin Ball, who, clad in skins, and decorated with wampum, the gift of Moroma, presented quite an aboriginal appearance, was to accompany the Indian girl as far as the borders of Massasoit's village, while St. Elmo would remain near the one to whom his every prayer was devoted. But scarcely had this arrangement been made when a new incident changed the plans of all.

Monoma had arrayed herself in huntress-garb, and her faithful squire. Rob Ball, was admiringly regarding her; while Marie, pale but beautiful, stood near them, leaning against St. Elmo, whose arm supported her fair head. Without the hut, a blue haze, the smoky vail of the Indian summer atmosphere, was tinted with sunrise hues, and around the little islet had fallen piles of brown leaves, the first tribute of autumn to the winds which were soon to strip her garments away, and leave her naked, waiting for the wintry grave. As yet, however, the forests were beautiful, and on this particular morning, the usual chilliness was not noticeable, but, on the contrary, a close and sultry atmosphere hung over the land and water, as if a violent tempest were at hand. On this day Monoma and Robin were to set forth for the Narragansett huntinggrounds.

But, as the small group stood in the wigwam, a step was suddenly heard without, and a tall figure darkened the entrance. St. Elmo and the sailor grasped their weapons, but Monoma uttered a cry of surprise and joy, and the next moment was clusped to the bosom of her fither, Tisquontam. At the same moment, a tall form, clad in European garb, appeared upon the threshold.

"Where is she? My child!" exclaimed the voice of the new-comer, as he gazed wildly around, and then advanced into the lodge. Tisquontam, supporting the form of his Monoma, pointed silently toward Marie—but alrealy the French maiden had been caught to the bosom of her sire.

"Marie! my beloved! im use of my angel-wife! do I again behold thee? Oh, joy, joy! I thank Thee, Heavenly Father, for this crowning mercy!"

Marie, bewillered and almost fainting, yet still sensible of the dear kindred of that voice which called her daughter, thoughter around the neck of Sieur Luzerne, while a torrent of tears blinded her beautiful eyes. St. Elmo and Robin Ball gazed in wonder at the scene. But all was soon explained—all tears dried, and every throb, save that of happiness, calmed to rest in the loving breast of the reunited ones. There, amid the quiet of the little islet, and the shadowy forest, while the morning sun struggled upward through the mists, each thrilling story of the past was related; glad voices mingled in the utterance of future hopes, till at length, as morn approached, Monoma suddenly rose, and cried:

"Let us go to your brother, dear Marie. He must share our happiness?"

"The noble boy! to him indeed must we hasten!" cried the Sieur de Luzerne. "At once let us set out."

Tisquontam rose and lett the wigwam, but only to repair to the sea-shore, whence he speedily returned, accompanied by his British captain, and a well-armed company of mariners. These were soon marshaled, with St. Elmo and Robin Ball at their head, and then the whole party set forth from the izle and took their way toward the Narragansett village.

JEAPTER XVIII.

THE BLAZING STAR.

and Sameeda on the moonlighted sea-shore, the princess mingled as usuar among the groups of youths and mailens who joined in spirit and converse before the lodge of Massaboit, where gathered the old men and children of the tribe. But Sameeda gave little thought to light word or gayety. Her heart was like a rose inled with rain; and often during the day tears would fill her eyes, as she murmured, half-unconsciously, her lover's name.

Once a dark cloud covered her split, for she beheld S kanto enter her father's lodge, and feared left the watchful eye of the medicine-man should read her secret. But the Indian's eyes, as he passed, were fixed upon the ground, and when he as in came forth, he greeted the princess amilinely, and spoke a pleasant word, unusual to his silent mood. So Sameeda greatheerful again, and turned away, to thank of her cherished Louis.

A hunt had been appointed for the day, and Massas. Sakanto, and the young white brave, were to follow the said trail. Together they pursued the flying deer, driving that arrows into his recking breast—together they chanted the loud nunting-song that called the squaws of the tribe to bear the slain quarry to the lodges—and together, when the sports were over, they returned to the village, and sat down to smoke the evening calumet.

But when the general feasting was over, and the light of burning pine-knots began to gleam from one and another of the huts, Louis directed his steps to the sea-shore to meet his ocloved Sameeda. One day more were they to tarry among the red-men, and then, through the unknown wilderness, snap their course for the homes of distant white men. Louis hastened toward the lonely trysting place, but had advanced not fir ere be met the priest Chade, who grasped his hand and whispered hurriedly:

"Son Louis! I dread there is dinger abroad."

"What fear you, Abbe Claude?"

"My son! the craft of the savage is beyon! our scruting Ich me why you lodge of Mas asoit is ill minated, and wh those arise warriors stand like sentingly around the door?"

"Tis but a feast, good Father Charle—a banquet of the royal chiefs, to which we, as exprises, can not be bidden. Sakanto spoke this day of it to Masseoit as we followed the hunting-path together."

"Ah! Sakanto! I fear that dark savage!" said the old men. "He hideth deep cunning in his busy brain. But why, my sen, hath not Samesla quitted her sire's lodge to meet us, as she promised, by the seaside?"

there awaits our turly coming. There together, father, we will invoke Heaven's blessing on our purpose, and take counsel, so that the morrow's noon shall behold us far on our southern way, where the settlements of our race can protect us against all the power of Sakanto or Mussasolt."

"Dut, my son, hear me! The princess has not yet left the ling her father's lodge. I watched it during the twilight, and teheld her floure pass within—and there, also, Louis, was the Aark medicine-man !"

"I will go thither, then," cried the young man. "I will demand to behold my wife!" But the good Abbe checked his rash footsteps.

Stay! it were death for either of us to enter the king's lot a unliden. But look! a warrior leaves the lodge.

He comes toward us!"

As the priest spoke, a plumed chief emerged from the wig wan of Massasoit, and advanced toward the spot where the two piderices stood. Passing on thenly before them, he drivered his message in a measured voice:

"Masses it bids his white brothers to the banquet!". Then, wheeling slowly, he walked away in grave silence.

"We must fellow," cried Louis. "It is but one of their rude festivals. We have usught to fear, and there shall I behold Sameeds."

"Heaven grant that no evil is in store for us!" answered the priest, shaking his white locks.

And, treading in the Coopprints of their plamed conductor the two captives entered the presence of the suchem Massa soit. The lodge was really illuminated by a score of pine torches, which flushed their fluring light upon the dusky chiefs assembled around the seat where sat their savage king at the head of the lodge, glittering in wampum and war-paint. Chanto stood beside him, and on either side of the wigwam a line of Narragansett braves smoked their pipes in solemn gravity. Near her father stood the Princess Sameeda, holding in her hand a rude drinking-vessel. Her eye brightened as it marked her lover's entrance, and the goblet trembled in her grasp. Sakanto and Massasoit exchanged looks, and the Abbe Chaude fancied that some hidden meaning lurked in their regards.

"Let the white chiefs sit," said the Indian king, and then dropped his eyes to the ground. Silence then reigned throughout the lodge, every warrior fixing his keen gaze upon Sakanto.

"Let the white father smoke the pipe of peace!" said the medicine-man, and gave his calumet into the hands of Abbe Claude.

The priest trembled, for he noted an expression in the running Indian's face that boded some hidden design, and he saw likewise that no pipe was extended to his young country man. At once the thought smote his mind that some treachery was intended toward Louis, and he turned pale, as he placed to his lips the pipe of Sakanto. But, aware that all eyes were upon him, he recovered himself, and, breathing an inward prayer, looked calmly around upon the dusky groups that lined the wigwam.

Massasoit raised his head, and beckoned his daughter toward him.

"Let the heart of Sakanto the wise be made glad!" said the sachem. "Let Sakanto drink of the draw 't which the child of Massocit has prepared for her sammer "assaad!"

Sameeda's check flashed, and Louis, as he looked apon her fancied that a tear glittered in the eyes of his beloved; never theless, the maiden knelt and presented the cup, which sho held to the medicine-man's lips. Louis clenched his fingers tightly together, and half muttered an impatient word, as he beheld this action on the part of his betrothed wife. Sakanto received the cup, and swallowed a deep draught of the liquor which it contained. Then, returning the goblet to Sameeda, he said, gravely:

"Let the daughter of Massasoit bear her father's cup to the young white brave. It is Sakanto's greeting."

Louis rose to his feet, and Sameeda's eyes now glistened with pleasure, for the transfer of drinking-vessels was accounted a mark of high honor at an Indian feast. She approached her young husband, and knelt gracefully before him.

"Drink!" she murmured.

"Hold, my son! drink not!" gasped the old priest, pressing the youth's arm.

Sakanto scowled.

"My father, there is naught to fear! He has himself drank of this cup!" returned Louis, as he lifted the goblet to his lips.

But Sameeda's face suddenly changed its clear expression, for she had caught a glance at Sakanto's countenance, and beheld it lit with a demoniac triumph as he watched his rival. A sudden inspiration seemed to flash through the brain of the princess, and ere a drop of the liquor which half filled the goblet had reached the lips of Louis, her hand was extended, and plucked away the cup.

Sakanto sprung to his feet, and all the braves arose, while the white men gazed with appalled looks on the darkening countenances around them.

"Samee la!" cried the sachem Massasoit, in a harsh tone.

The princess made no answer. She half reversed the goblet, and permitted its contents to escape slowly. Then, hold ing it forth in the glare of the torchlight, the brave girl pointed to its bottom, where glittered a couple of white bones.

"Does Sakanto give his brother to drink of the adder's prison?" she sail, calmly. "Has the white brave a charmed the, that he shall the not the serpent's tooth?"

And, as the light theshed upon the cup, Abbe Claude and Louis saw that the white bores at its bottom were the venomous fangs of a rattlesnake.

The dark check of Massasoit suddenly paled, and his firm lip quivered like that of a woman. He had arisen from his throne, and now stood beside Sakanto, who, with a fiendish smile wreathing his lip, and a fierce glare in his eyes, regarded the young white captives. The medicine-man was furious at the failure of his attempt to poison his rival; for it was he who, in the moment of his quaffing the first draught from the goblet, had conveyed into it the serpent's teeth.

"Poison!" cried Abbe Claude, and dashed the calumet which he held upon the ground.

"Poison!" murmured Louis, his eyes resting upon the princess. "By thee-by thee, Sameeda?"

A terrible pain darted through the youth's brain, and his blood rushed coldly to his heart as he, for an instant, suspected that his wife had been privy to the plot against his life. Sameeda divined his thought, and an unutterable woe sent the blood back to her heart in a chilling, sickening flood. She tottered forward, and, losing memory of all save her husband, cast her arms about his neck.

"Sameeda is innocent!" she cried; "Sameeda is the wife of Louis! Sameeda is faithful!"

"I believe thee, my sister-my bride!"

He clasped her to his heart, forgetful of Sakanto or danger. He gazed into her loving eyes, and, pressing his lips to her brow, drew her closely to him till their two hearts mingled in quick pulsations.

"Come with me! Away, my husband! Sameeda will gto the white man's lodges. Come!"

Alas! the senses of the princess wandered, and, breathing a long, shivering sigh, she sunk insensible upon her husband's breast. Louis knelt on the ground, supporting the form of his wife, while Abbe Claude cried out to the braves, who, with Massasoit, were now crowding near:

"Back! ye have murdered her! Back, or Heaven's ven geance will assuredly come upon all this tribe!"

"The warriors paused, for the white sage spoke as if Inspired. But Sakanto laughed, and advanced to meet his rival. At this moment a great noise, as of bending trees, was heard without, and a great clap of thunder suddenly reverberated through the heavens.

The torches flared brightly upon the scene within the wigwam. Massasoit leaned upon his war-club, as if feeble for the sudden fainting of his child smote the sachem's heart. The warriors, grouped around, gazed upon the medicine-man, who alone scenied unmoved. Abbe Chaude kneeled beside Louis, who was supporting his Indian bride, endeavoring to ecall her to consciousness.

Again the terrific thunder sounded without, accompanied by quick flashes of lightning, beneath which the torch-glare paled. Abbe Claude began to pray aloud, uplifting his arms to Heaven.

The Indians, as they listened to the thunder, and beheld the vivid lightning, and heard the low voice of Abbe Claude invoking the Great Spirit's protection, felt a superstitious awe steal over their minds—all save Sakanto, who threw back his plumed head and laughed scornfully.

"Why does the white sagamore waste his breath? Sakante will not harm the old man, but he will have vengeance upor the young pale-face who would rob him of Sameeda. Is it not so, Massasoit?" he asked, appealing to the king.

Massasoit groaned, and bowed his head.

"Thus will Sakanto punish all his enemies!" cried the medicine-man, emboldened by the king's assent.

"The Great Spirit will not permit the wickel to triumph!" answered the Abbe Claude, using the Indian tongue, while he rose gravely to his feet. Meantime, the lightning continually flashed into the lodge, gleaming on the red-men's forms, and ningering like fire on the priest's white forcheal. "The Great Spirit will avenge the blood shed by his red children lie will utterly destroy the tribes, and give their hunting grounds to those who live not like wild beasts, and betray not the innocent."

Massasoit shuddered at the white father's words, but Sakanto laughed, brandishing his war-club.

"The red-men are as the sands of the sea-shore in number!" cried the arrogant medicine-man; "the Great Spirit himsent can not destroy us, for we are too many! Let the white prophet be silent. He speaks lies!"

"Though ye were consittess as the grains of dust upon the mount ins, yet bath the Great Spirit ways to destroy you."
ways that ye know not of !"

"The white liar shall die!" cried Sakanto, furious at the bold words of the priest.

A succession of loud whoops were now heard without the wirwam. Immediately a warrior rushed into the circle, with every mark of astonishment and fear upon his countenance. Behind him followed Tisquontam, attired in the full costume of a chieftain, and leading by the hand his daughter Mononia. At their backs came the Sieur Luzerne, Robin Ball, and the young merchant-captain, while several stalwart warriors, heavily armed, appeared at the lodge-door.

Massasoit, as he beheld the strangers, preceded by the well-known Tisquontam, was struck with the fear that the Iroquois had become a traitor, and was now bringing the pale-faces to avenge the fate of the emigrants. The sachem, nevertheless, hesitated not to make a gallant show of resistance. He sprung to his feet, and, with a single glance, summoned every red warrior to his side, and then, fixing his eyes upon Tisquontam, said calmly:

"Has the Iroquois taken up the hatchet? Is he now upon the war-path?"

"We are friends," returned Tisquontam quickly. "The pale-faced chiefs come to the lodge of Massasoit to smoke the pipe of peace."

"Ugh!" said the In lian, relievel of his apprehension.

But Sakanto's ominous voice was now heard:

"The pale-faces are liars!" he cried, savagely, and a low response ran around the groups of savages.

"They are friends to the Narragansetts!" answered Tisquontam. "They wish to bury the hatchet. This chief of many winters has come to the lodge of Mass soit to seek his lost son, who is a captive, and who now stands by the faughter of the red chief."

Saying this, Tisquontan pointed to Louis, who, with Sameeda clinging to his bosom, looked wonderingly around.

The princess hal recovered from her swoon, and her gaze fremblingly followed that of her lover. At this moment a sow cry was heard at the door, and the maiden Marie, who had been left for better security in charge of St. Elmo, without the entrance of the wigwam, duried past the Iroquois, and sunk upon the breast of Louis, who obened his arms to receive her

This new interruption caused silence for a moment m the 'odge, which was broken by Sakanto.

"What does the white squaw among warriors?" he cried. 'Is the Narragansett sackem a dog, that his lodge should not be respected !-

"The white bird hath found her mate. It is the brother of her heart, and this is the father of the captives, who seeks his lost children?" And Tisquontam led the Sieur Luzerne toward Massasoit, whose noble features expressed a quick interest in the event.

But Sakanto, divining in a moment that the generous pature of the 1n lian king was moved at the words of Tis quontam, now trowned upon the Iroquois, and then addressing the warriors, exclaimed, angrily:

"May the curse of Hobbomocko rest upon the Narragansett who heeds the words of an Iroquois! May the curso devour all who listen to the cunning words of a pale-face! Sakanto will save himself!"

Uttering these words, the medicine-man sprung forward from the circle of warriors, and grasping suddenly the hair of Louis, who, folded in his sister's embrace, and impeded like wise by the elinging arms of Sameeda, could offer no resistance, dragged the young man violently to the ground, and lifted his batchet for a deadly stroke. All the demonisc spirit of the wicked Indian gleamed in his eyes, and assuredly it seemed that at the very moment when sister and father were at his side, the youth's hour had come. Massasoit grasped his club, and Tisquontam and Sieur Luzerne sought to rush forward, but the medicine-man triumphantly regarded them, conscious that he could deal his murderous blow ere their feet might advance a step toward him. But a power mightier than Sakanto was now abroad, whose fearful presence was suddenly attested. The first sound of the hurricane was rising on the shore, sweeping the high plain on which the Narragansett village was situated; and, even as the medicineman poised his hatchet for the blow, the appalling roar of the storm was heard without. The light roof of Massasoit's wigwam was uplified by the blast, and its thatched fragments twept away like the dry leaves of a tree in the autumnal gala

Then, as all eyes turned toward the sky, a terrific chorus of wild cries was heard from beyond the lodge, mingled with the howl of the wind, which had swept onward in its destructive career.

But it was not the cries of horror and fear from the Narragansetts without, nor the fierce sound of the hurricane's approach, that caused every red-man's eye to remain fixed, and made the bold brow of Sakanto to blanch, while the tomahawk trembled in his nerveless grasp. It was a spectacle of ominous character that appalled them.

A glorious yet terrible phenomenon was presented to the shrinking gaze of the Narragansetts. Across the western skies, from horizon to zenith, stretched the blazing length of a comet. Its flery glare streamed down into the roofless lodge. There it hung, an awful phantom in the lurid heavens, menacing ruin and death to the world. With one accord Massasoit and his terrified Indians rushed from the lodge, forgetful of all save the immediate horror of the sight above. Sakanto released his hold of Louis and staggered after the king.

All the people of the village had now crowded before the sachem's wigwam; affrighted groups of warriors, women, old men and children. A dismal wail went up from all, for each feared an individual fate, presaged by the dread master of the skies.

Some threw themselves prostrate upon the earth, hiding their faces in the grass; some leaped and ran wildly about; others, with bloodless checks and gasping breath, clung to one another, gazing, spell bound, upon the object of their fear.

"Save us, oh Sakanto!" cried Massasoit, as the medicinenan followed him to the door. "Let the Great Spirit's wrath be averted!"

And all the Narragansett people echoed the words of their sachem:

"Save us, oh Sakanto!"

The medicine-man seized his bow, and fixed an arrow in its string. Then, winding around the shaft a wampum amulet, which he took from his breast, and yelling a wild incantation, he shot upward, toward the star of fire. The Indians awaited he result in superstitious awe, but no effect appeared to follow their sagamore's action.

Massasolt cast himself upon the sward, rolling his eyes enviously around upon the faces of his cowering braves. At this justine Able Claude advanced from the lodge, and almost instinctively the invections of the munitude addressed him, for they knew that the white prophet's wisdom was great, and then be discoursed of the moon and stars. Sakanto himself they way for the priest, though he ceased not to mutter his own pow-wows and mysterious incantations.

But the blazing star did not recede—its light streaming balefully over forest, plain and waters. Abbe Claude passed in the milst of the red warriors at the spot where Massasoit had sunk to the ground, and, standing beside the kinz, gazed with reverence upon the awful menifestation of his Maker's handiwork in the far-off deeps of space.

But when the good father beheld the medicine-man affix another arrow to his bow, in or ler to repeat his useless magic, he could no longer remain silent.

Forbear, ignorant and presumptuous!" he cried. "Tempt not Him who made you star, to hard it upon His rebellious creatures! Behold in yonder sign the token of Manitou's wrath against your blood guiltiness. Lo! the words which I spoke so lately are now made sure by the power of the Great Spirit. Pestilence, and war, and desolation shall come upon yo! Your land shall be possessed by the strangers, and yo shall be scattered before them as the dry leaves are blown before the winds. Tremble, and repent!"

With these words, Abbe Claude passed beyond the groups of shuddering Narragansetts, and joined his young countryman, Louis, who, with Sameeda and Marie still clinging to him, had left the wigwam, and now stood at some distance, surrounded by Tisquontam and his friends. Then arose from the tribe a spontaneous cry, which had scarcely subsided cre Massasoit began solemnly to chant the death song; for the sachem felt that Manitou had spoken by the white signmore's mouth.

And as that monotonous death-chant arose from all the variors and old men, Tisquontam, the Iroquois, led the way for his friends, from the Narragansett village, their path illumined by the blazing star that shone luridly through the murky air. Once Sameeda locked back, to gaze then her father, but the voice of Louis whispered in her ears, and ale

Well, indeed, was it that the Iroquois hurried away Lis companions, and that, ere another night, the reunited friends and relatives were safely embarked on board the galleon, far tway from land. For the comet had been the forerunner of the harricane and earthquake, and the next evening occurred Lat fearful convulsion of nature which, as we have related, Lurical the Creole, Cuptain Pierre, to the doom that he afterward met at the Lands of Matakan. And ere meny moons passed away, the works of Abbe Claude became yet more fearfally verified. Pestilence came upon the Indian land, and of the great Norraggersett nation the twentieth men along survived. Sakanto fell one of the first victims to the terrible placue, which had doubtless been communicated to the savages by some of the articles plandered from the emigrant-ship. Be that as it may, however, it is certain that, afterward, when the Plymouth settlers were first encountered by Samoset and other savaces, they learned how their coming had been heralded by a bizzing star, regarded by the Indians as an omen of war airl pestilence. The pestilence which smote the red tribes was the small-pox.

Mass soit lived on as sachem among his reduced tribe, till ong after the coming of the Pilgrim Fathers; but his daughter, he wild bride of the stranger, dwelt with her husband in the listant French settlements of Canada, and slept at lest by his ade near the great waters of Niceara. There, too, tarried St. Elmo, espoused to Marie, with Monoma, who had learned to ove Robin Ball, and under whose sway the rough sailor became gentle as a lamb. Tisquontum himself chose to remain near the seaside, though yearly, at the Moon of Falling Leaves, he visited his child and her pale-faced friends. And when, at length, the Euglish settlers made their homes on the Nerraganist shores, no red-man proved more faithful to their materials than did the once-kidnapped Iroquois.

Young Feople's Hand-Books

The Dine Hand-Books for Young People cover a wide range of subjects, and are especially ming so i to t entered. I may count tate at ence the cheapest and the most useful works yet put Ento the near of for popular we set to n. But we done set places 12,no., rent postpaid on receipt of price, by the publishers, BEADLE AND ADAMS, 98 William Street, New York.

No. 1.-DIME GENTS' LETTER-WRITER,

And Practical Grade to Comparity and combine he forms, mind is, any greations and rules for the unit of all classes, on all occasions; also a list of improper words and expressions, together with their c real first and also a complete dictionary of mistoes, purases, diome, etc. By Louis La GRAND, M. D.

COTTENTS. COMP . ITIC N .-- The servet of a good letter . dire to as to a novice, the rules of composiin, etc.

NERAL ADVICE TO LETTER-WRITERS. TTERS OF BUSINESS.

ITERS OF PLEASURE AND FRIEND-

"TTERS OF LOVE.—Hints and suggestions; a deciaration; answer; a briefer declaration of attachment; answer; real love-letters of eminent personages, etc.

ETTERS OF DUTY, OF TRUST, Erg. - What | WRITING FOR THE PROSS. they are and how to write them; forms, etc.; [MPROPRIETIES OF EXPRESSION, at a ence; communicating distressing news triparents, it is run grafther son etc.

LETTERS OF RELATIONSHIP,-- Family ce respondence; its sacred characte, an. propr ties; examples of real le ters, etc.

LETTERS OF VARIOUS OCCASIONS.certificate of character; another, for a mat another, for a clerk; application for a school tencher's place; soliciting a vote; declining nomination; a girl applying for a place, a other; application for a governess' situation of advice from a lady to her friend; a complaint: PHRASES, MOTTOES, IDIOMS, Erc.

No. 2.-DIME BOOK OF ETICUETTE.

for La Pes and Gentlemen; being a guide to true gentility and go vi-buseding, and a complete directory to the usages and observances of a ciety. Including etiquette of the Ball-room, of the Fig. 1. g Party, the Daner Party, the Cartand Chang Table, of Badhers, of the Home Carrie, etc., etc. Prepared expressly for the "Dime Series," by a Committee of Three.

hashfulness; kindness v. rudeness; the bores I society, how to tr at them.

gauly of " finsh " attire; simplicity in dress a mark of good breeding.

law of politeness a law of kindness; when otc., and forms.

EVENING PARTIES, DANCES, Etc.-The et-

for the same. SAMES OF CARDS, CHESS, Erc. - When proper and how conducted; general rules of the games; the ill-breeding of betting or bragging.

CONTENTS. KNTRANCE INTO SOCIETY.—Confidence vs., ON CONVERSATION.—Its usefulness and good results; how to comport yourself; directions for it.

ON DRESS AND ORNAMENTS .-- The vul- ON LETTER AND NOTE WRITING .-- Proprictics and improprieties of the same; your ral directions for a good letter.

ON VISITS, INTRODUCTIONS, Etc.-The HOW TO GIVE AND RECEIVE INVITA-TIONS.—General usage in all cases.

visits are proper; introductions, presentations, ON ENTERTAINMENTS,—Eliquette of the table; how to serve a guest, and how to be served; special directions.

iquette of the ball-room; general directions ON PERSONAL CLEANLINESS, - A word w the laborer; on religion and respect for app. on theaters, promen des, etc.; on love, Cov-1 ship and marriage; the laws of home etiquetee special advice to ladies; general observa toms and closing chapter.

No. 3.-DIME BOOK OF VERSES,

Comprising Rhymes, Lines and Mittres, for Livers and Friends; V., atimes, Altern Flecca, Gul Verses, Birthday Lines, and postry for Bridals, Births, Mourning, Epitapha, etc. CONTENTS.

VERSES FOR ALBUMS. MOTTOES AND COUPLETS. 6T. VALENTINE VERSES.

BRIDAL AND MARRIAGE VERSES 'ERSES ON BIRTHS AND INFANCY. RSES TO SEND WITH FLOWERS. RSES OF LOVE AND AFFECTION. JUAY VERSES. THDAY YERSES.

EPITAPHS AND MOURNING VERSES, -Fo all ages and classes. THE LOVER'S CASKET.

I This little volume is a veritable pocket cova panion. It is everybody's poet. It is for a occasions, for old and young, for male and $ male. It will be treasured like a keepas' and used like a dictionary.

No. 4.-DIME BOOK OF DREAMS.

Court Romance and Mystery; with a complete interpreting Distantary. Compiled from the rice accredited sources for the "Dime Series." CONTENTS.

INTRODUCTORY.

THE ROMANCE OF DREAMS .- Embodying dreams of all kinds and characters, with the construction placed upon them by the most eminent authorities, and narratives of the extraordinary fulfillment of them

THE FIELDOMENA OF IL. AMS, -A PARK TWT It to a volume fall of interest even to the ciab's views on the subject, giving a rational; eaintion of the phenomena, with instances cite. We the server

THE CAPTURE NE CROWERS TYSTINOSIS

-Favoring the supernatural na tre of dreams and a belief in their revelations.

DICTION ARY OF DREAMS, -- Comprising the most complete interpretation-Dicteorry (*c. prepared, embracing the whole Alphabet of subjects.

general reader, being, in that respect, 40000thing like Mrs. Crowe's " Night Sith w Neture." and Robert Dale Owenis " Front . 'Is or the Boundary of Assuber World."

No. 5.-DIME FORTUNE-TELLER.

COMPRISING THE ART OF FORTUNE-TELLING NOW TO READ CHARACTER, BUG-

CONTENTS.

SORTUNG-TELLING BY CARDS .- Dealing BY MEANS OF CABALISTIC CALCULA the Cards by Throca, Dealing the Cards by nevens, Dealing the Cards by Fifteens, The FALMISTRY, OR TELLING FORTUNES BY Twenty-one Cards, The Lalian Method, Present, Past and Future, Another Method of FORTUNE-TELLING BY THE GROUNDS IN Consulting the Cards, To Know if you will bet your Wish, The English Method of Con- HOW TO READ YOUR FORTUNE BY THE gul ing the Cards.

11111

THE LINES OF THE HAND.

A TEA OR COFFEE CUP.

WHITE OF AN EGG. KOW TO TELL A PERSON'S CHARACTER DREAMS AND THEIR INTERPRETASE

No. 6 .- DIME LADIES' LETTER-WRITER.

Bigling the various forms of Letters of S he I Days, Love and I run in 1, of Society, sta-

CHATEMES

MOW TO WRITE AND HOW NOT TO WRITE.

MOW TO PUNCTUATE, CAPITALIZE, Erg. LETTERS OF CHILDHOOD. LETTERS OF SCHOOL DAYS.

LETTERS OF FRIENDSHIP. LETTERS OF COURTSHIP AND LOVE. THE FUNCES SCHOOL INVITATIONS IN

TROOM CHONS TO. CETTERS OF " LAUPA HIEY. LETTERS OF BUSINESS.

WRITING FOR THE PRESS. RULES FOR SPELLING. PROVERBS FROM SHAKSPEARE. POETIC QUOTATIONS. WORDS ALIKE IN SOUND, BUT DIFFER IN UIN MEANING AND SPELLING HI PLANATION OF THE MOST COMMON BBBREVIATIONS OF WORDS.

FRENCH QUOTATIONS AND PHRASES. SPANISH WORDS AND PHRASES. ITALIAN WORDS AND PURASES.

No. 7.-DIME LOVERS' CASKET.

A Treatise and Guide to Friendship, Love, Courtship and Marriage. Embracing ales a comprete F Aral Dictionary, etc.

CONTANTS.

PRIENDSHIP .- Its Personality, Between Man. and Words, Cose to musica disper Let tors, A Werning, fixedicat havier, A l'i. Posts, A l w to ligroper laboratey, See a to 1 at 1 Men, Smut set 2 to Areas temans tries, Gitte, Leasured Late, Creek, sie co.

LOVE. - 1. . Drawn of Lore, Lores or tive hem, the ches The property of Love, A Man's Way, A Woman's Way, Unworthy Objects of Live by Woman, Unwor | MISCELLANEOUS .- Language of the Handthy Objects of Man's Love, How to Avoid Alista es.

64) [1. 1 > 11 P .- The Door Ajar, Disengaged, Engaged: at what age is it proper, Engagement not to be protracted, The Wooing Time, The Proposal, Asking Papa, The Rights of a Paan Engagement.

MARRIAGE. -- The Proper Time, Various forms of Marriage, The Trousseau, Presenta, Bogquets. The Bridesmaids, The Bridegroomsmen, The Bride, The Bridegroom, the Certificate, After the Ceremony, The Wedding Brenkfast "Cards" or "No Cards," Notes Congratuia tory.

AFTER MARRIAGE.-Something to be Read Twice, Twelve Gulden Life-Maxime, A Talk will the Unmarried.

kerchief, Language of the Fan, Language of the Cane, Language of Finger Rings, Wedding Anniversation, viz.: The Paper Wedding, Wooden Dedding, Tin Wedding, Crystal Wedding, Jinen Wedding, Silver Wedding, Golder Walding.

rent, Engaged, Proposal Rejected, Breaking off, THE LANGUAGE OF FLOWERS .- How to Use the Vocabulary, The Vocabulary, I-Flowers, The Vecabulary. II-Sentiments

No. 8 .- DIME PALL-ROOM COMPANION.

a dende to Pancing. Giving Rules of First otto, Hate on Friends Parties, Policie . , Bail-room, etc.

CONTENTA.

arright ITE .- Arrangements, Private Parties, | SQUARE DANCES .- Plain Quadrille, Doutes The Parker or Dancing Apatiment, Music, Re-Treshmente, Ladies' Toilets, Gentlemen's Irvess, The Guesta, MASQUERADES. PROMENADE CONCERTS. SOCIABLES. ORDER OF DANCING. SPECIAL RULES OF CONDUCT.

Q AIT Je, The V a Fr, Tar L . . . The Catedonians. The Prince Imperial, The Vit ginia Reel. The Spanish Dence, La Tempete.

ROUND DANCES .- The Waltz a Trois Temper Waltz in Double Time, Cellarius or Mazourka Waltz, The Schottische, The Polka, the Galeg. Redo va. Polka Redowa, Eamerelda Panisa Polka, The Varsoviana.

EST Thee borne are for exie bin. B. Women's a; or will be sort, judget, on sor a lore se, as white of price, were drawn sacre, by

BELULE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 88 William Street, New York

FAMILY HAND-BOOKS.

The Dime Family Series (Nos. 1 to 5 inclusive) aim to supply a class of text-books and manuals fitted for every person's use—the old and the young, the learned and the unlearned. They are of the problem ors, BEALLE AND ADAMS, 98 William Street, New York.

No. 1.-DIME COOK BOOK;

Dr. the Housewife's Pocket Companion. Embodying what is most Economic, most Practical, most Excellent. Revised and enlarged edition. 100 pp. 12mo. By Mrs. Victor.

BREAD.—Potato, Brown, Bran, Wuter, Rye and Indian, Wheat and Rye, Milk, Rising, Butters wilk Bread, Bread Biscuit or Rolls, French Rolls, Soda Biscuits, etc., etc.

HOF BREAD AND CAKES.—Short, Corn, Johnny, Apple Johnny, Griddle, Rich Griddle, and Common Cakes, Burnoca, Washes, Mannes, and Politicia, Rye Fritters, etc., etc.

TOTHER BREAKFAST DISHES. Total, Dry Total, Buttered Teast, Mick That, Fred Rice/ te t. Str., nea, Plantel and Boiled Erys, Wheaten Or. a, Homity, Sump, Harry Padaing. M. Vis. Rossing, Bolong, Eryong suxteen various methods for preparing conte.

. VEAL .- Boiled Yeal, Fried Chops, Veal Pie, Leg of Vent, Loin of Veal, Shoulder of Veal, Calves' Feet, Calf's Head and Liver.

MILITON.—Mutton Chops, Chops as Beefsteaks, Neck of Mutton, Shoulder of Mutton, Leg of Mutton, Haunch of Mutton, Saddle of Mutton, Mutton Cutlets, Irish Stew, Leg of Lamb, etc.

PORK.—Pork Steaks, To Fry Pork, To Roast Pork, Spare Ribs of Pork, To Boil a Ham, Pig's Foot, Sours, Head Cheese, Fine Sausages, Pickle for Hams, Salting Pork, To Melt Lard.

FOULTRY AND GAME.—Roast and Boiled Turkey, Roast and Baked Goose, Ducks, Roast Fowl, Chickens Bolled, Fowl Broiled, To Frienssee a Fowl, Chicken Pie, To Cook Pigeons, etc. but the a bresh board or Bore, B. ed Snai, To Brod Fresh board Coulant, Satt Cod sh, Codtish Balis, Stewed Oysters, Fried Oysters, Pickied Oysters, Chowder.

P. . . dish Toast, Rice Balls, Hashed Mutton Head Cheese, A New Breakfast Dish.

Beef, Vermicetti, Pea, Bean, Split Peas and Barley, Vegetable and Rice, Tomato.

VEGETABLES.—Twenty different varieties.
SAUCES.—White, Caper for Fish, Egg, Plain Butter, Cranberry, Apple, Sweet.

Published different varieties.

PUDDINGS,-Christmas Plum Pudding, and eighteen other recipes.

CAKES.—Thirty-four recipes.
TEA, COFFEE, CHOCOLATE.—Eight recipes.
JELLIES, PRESERVES, Erc.—Forty-one recipes.

Place It's .- To Pickie various kinds of Vegetables and Fish.

ICE CREAM .- How to make it.

OYSTERS AND OTHER SHELL-FISH.

THE CARVER'S MANUAL .- General directions for Carving.

MISCELLANEOUS .- Chicker and Plum Pudding, Potato Muffins, Drov Piscuit, etc., etc.

No. 2.—DIME RECIPE BOOK Sick Room, Tolles, Kitche, Larder, etc. Revised and enlarged edition. No. 2. Victor.

THE PARLCas—To choose Carpets, Directions for Carpets, To clean Turkey Carpets, Metl. in Carpets, To extract Oil or Spermaceti from Carpets, etc., To make Stair Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, to the first of the Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, and the control of the Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, To make Stair Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, To the control of the carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, To the carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Make Carpets, Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Make Carpets, Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Carpets has Carpets, Carpets has Carpets, Carpets hast, Cheep Carpets, Carpets has Carpe etc., A Cure for Burns, Scalds, Body in Flames, and seventy more recipes.

FOOD FOR THE SICK.—A Strengthening Jelly for Invalids, Mutton Custord for Bowel Comfaints or Consumptive Cases, Chicken, Beef, etc., Toast Water, Rice Jelly, Bread Jelly, Calvery et is at a longer, but of the Winey, Water Grand, Milla Longer, two terms, along the

THE FOILET; THE HAIR .- To remove Dandruff, A Capital Pornade, Twiggs' Receipt for Hair, Bandoline for the Hair, Hair-curling Laquid, Oil of Roses.

THE TEETH .- To clean the Teeth and Guins, Quining Tooth Powder, Prepared Charcoal, Petu-

THE HANDS.—To remove Stains from the Hands, To improve the Hands and Arms, Ointment for the Hands, Chapped Hands.

The Hands, Chapped Hands.

The Hands and Arms, Ointment for the Hands and Ointment for the H

Freckles, Pimples, Kalydor for Complexion.
COSMETICS, PERFUMES, Erc., Fa. v. Powder, P. ed. Powder, Rowland's Marasser Co., and

CARE OF CLOTHING.—Furs, Woolen, Silk, Gloves, Ribbons, Lace, Bonnets, etc.
THE KITCHEN.—To am Fruit, Pears, Quinces, Berries, Pears, Remas, Tountoes, West Corn, To preserve Fruit Jellies from Mold, To provent "Graining," and seventy-five more receives.

MELANGE. A HOW TO MAKE BUTTER AND CHEESE.

PROCESS OF WINE-MAKING.
MISCELLANEOUS.—To mend China, To get vid of Bedbugs and Cockrossies, to make the
To manufacture Capilles. To repair Broken Glass, at t a hundred other useful recipes.

No. 3.-DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAN,

And Manual for the Sick Room. With Famil. Discuses and their Treatment, Hints on Nursing and Rearing, Children's Complaints, Physiological Eacts, Rules of Health, Keeijes for Preparing well-known Curatives, etc., etc., based upon the authority of Drs. WARRAN, DONNA, PARKER, and others. Expressly prepared for the Dime series.

This admirable work is peculturly fitted for PRACTICAL use in ordinary cases. To mothers and autsus—to those living on farms or in villages where a physician is not always available—to those who wish to save expense in those cases where the illness is not of a complicated or serious character—this book will prove a Companion and Gride. Its contents are as follows:

SKIN DISEASES.—Barber's itch, Discolored Skin, Disorders of the Hair, Disorders of Oil and Sweat Glands, Dry Pimples, Erysipelas, Inflammatory Blush, Itch. Measles, Nettle and Rose Rash, Capulous Scall, Scarlet Fever, Tetter, Warts and Corns.

Bran, O. Sheer and I get a ... to a control of the Bran, D. Sheer and I get a ... to a control of the Brain, Locked-Jaw, Neuralgia. Nightmare, Sunstroke, etc.

D'SEASES OF THE THROAT.—Influenza, Mumps.

1 St 1873 OF THE CHEST .- Bronchitte, Lung Fever, Pleurisy.

Dispers, Gravel, Heartburn, Inflammation of the Liver, Kidneys, Spleen, Stomach and Bowers, Milk Sickness, Piles, Suppression of Urine, Vomiting.

Blies of Venomous anakes, Bites of Insects, Chilblains, Cancer, Congestive Faver, Carbuncle, Drawning, Earache, Fever and Ague, Felon, Front Rites, Malignant Postule, Nose-bleeding, Rupture, Rheumatism, Scurvy, Scrofula Strains, Touth-ache, Typhold Fever, etc.

ACCIDENTS-REMEDIES.—Apparent Death from Nozions Vapors, Apparent Death from Charcoal, Apparent Death from Lightning, Apparent Death by Hanging, Bleeding from a Wound, Belladonna, Hyoseyamus, Stramonium and Conium, Clothing on Fire, Upsatting of a Boat.

ANTIDOTES TO POISON. -- Ammonia or Hartshorn, Antimenial Wine, Tartar Emetic, Arsender, Commonia of Marie, Nature, Nat

Nursing Sick Children, Rickets, Scrottla, Signs of Disease.

RULES OF HEALTH.

No. 4. - DIME HOUSEWIVES' MANUAL;

Or, H w to Keep Here and Order a l. ... Il w to 1 ... to deep to her vata, I w to Cat, F.i., and More termed is; it w to t ... to 1 ... is ... the week, liew to Care ter I : is and Household Pats, etc., etc. A Companion to the Dime "Cook" and "Recipe" Books. By Mrs. M. V. Victor. The contents are as follows:

from Burning, How to Serve Dinner.

§(c) W 10 live AND (Lic ANS.) General Prestock, Social, Crisci, Pick, W. Str., Poly, Prople, Prople, Prople, Color, Color, Color, Color, Edge Str., Color, Serve, Color, Str., Color, Colo

HOW TOUT I AND WORK GARNENTS A Tree, So For Jackets, Winter Jackets, April &

Cape, Shirts, Children's Clothing, Infants' Clothing, Choice of Coiers

[IOW 10] PARE CARE OF FLANTS, FLOWERS For Hore Pierts Points In the Designed to Stand Own, Posts for good for Flowers, Patrick in the few Water Car, East Control of Contr

HOW IN TAKE CARE OF HELLS And how, property of the west of the control of the con

The Surfeit, The Pip, the Husk, Egg-bound.

No. 5.-DIME DRESSMAKER.

In reduction, The County, We to B. The Secret V. Mr. North Control of the Phone of the County, West Internal and Trees, of T. of, Control of the County, West Internal Indian Companies, P. Control of the County, Control of the County, Control of the Marriage, Dynamics, P. Control of the County, Con

STANDARD DIME DIALOGUES

For Echool Exhibitions and Home Intertainments.

Nos. 1 to 21 inclusive. 15 to 25 Popular Dialogues and Dramos in each book Euch volume 100 la and personal regardence to being explened to.

Beadle & Adams, Publishers, 98 William St., W. Y.

The sand on a lara haragers, sto leave by the atentic are a little for Exhibitions, being adapted to schools and parlors with or without the furniture of a stage, and suited to SCHOL. ARS AND YOUNG PEOPLE of every uge, both male and female. It is fair to assume that not other books in the market, at any price, contain so many useful and available dialogues and dramas of wit, pathos, humor and sentiment.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 1.

Meeting of the Muses. For nine young ladies. Buiting a Live Englishman, For to rea boys. Tesso's Coronation. For male and female. Fushion. For two ladies, The Reheamal. For six boys, Which will you Choose! For two boys, The Queen of May. For two little girls. The Tea-Party. For four ladies. The Mission of the Spirits. Five young ladies.

Hlobnobbing. For five speakers, The Secret of Success. For three speakers. Young America. Three males and two females. Josephine's Destiny. Four females, one male. The Folly of the Duck. For three male speakers. Dogmatism. For three male speakers, The Ignorant Confounded. For two boys. The Fast Young Min. For two males. I read to W. It. Whandformale, The York Read there I and I have Mrs. Snittles' Confession. For male and female. The Village with One Gentleman. For eight fee males and one male.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 2.

The Genius of Liberty. 2 males and I female. How to Write ' Popular' Stories. Two males. Chierry to . I what the at the Poing Good and Saying Bad. Several characters. The Golden Rule. Two males and two females. The Gift of the Fairy Queen. Several females. Tak-n I and D ne For. For two Characters. The in her A ... ta Vis t to to City. For sev- T'e Li 'e Fill i ers. Fer two I ligitle. real to the tors. The Two Romans. For two males. Trying the Characters. For three males. "Le Rambow. For several characters.

1 . I wo It . O . I resorable A Sensation at Last. For two maics. The Greenhorn. For two males, The Three Men of Science. For four males-The Old Lady's Will. For four males, H wath brank her. Per hier nies. The Virtues. For six young ladies. A Connubial Eclogue. The Partie of the Five males and ane female. The English Traveler. For two males.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 3.

The I'm Circu. Torangent test of. I ween Reform Convention. For ten females. Keeping Bad Company. A Fares. Ferfive males. The Two Romans. For two males. Courting Under Difficulties. 2 males, I female. The Same. Second scene. For two males. Escaping the Draft. For numerous males.

The torstee, (). I'm two medica, Masterpiece. For two males and two females. National Representatives. A Burlesque. 4 males. Showing the White Feather. 4 males. I female. The Battle Call. A Recitative. For one made.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 4.

The Frost King, For ten or more persons. Starting in Life. Three males and two females. A Scene from " Paul Pry." For four males. Faith, Hope and Charity. For three little girls. | i.e Charms. For three males and one female. Trace and Jon, I commiss to f. In , Cond Dr. . I'r threat the The May. A Floral Faucy. For eix litte girls. The Light Way. A Collegey. For two buys. The Enchanted Princess. 2 males, several females What the Ledger Says. For two meters. Phrenology. A Discussion. For twenty males, The Latter. For two males,

The Stubbletown Volunteer. 2 males, I female. Monor to Whom Hon r is Due. 7 males, I founde The Crimes of Diess. A Collegue. For two beys.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 5.

The Three Guesses. For school or parlor, Sentiment. A "Three Person." Fa ce. Behird the Curtain. For males and females. The Eta Pi Society. Five boys and a toucher, Francis Inc. for the locarmiera Viete Vita An Artig Chernic. Trading in "Traps" For several males. The School Boys' Tribunal. For ten boys. A Long Page of the state of the Illew Valo that ab Armel, a class to the

Putting on Airs. A Collogue. For two maios. The Straight M rk. For several leys. Two ideas of Lite. A Colloquy. For ten girla Extract from Marino Paliero. The Six Virtues. For aix vonng ladies. " " I'm a n' Hare. E "tromis. Free to the property of the security A B vvc(I's lyes, loregatories introgirle

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 6.

The Way They Kent a Secret. Mais and females. The Two Counselors. For three males. Toll' ther the tree is The Blanch Wings Till I particulate al. Want in the contract of the makes All and to I at C. tars. Na one I females. Tiply nego Jow. Fragm.co. Sacrpus for tureses and one female,

The Vermi a of Filler Transcriber of females. A net i tale li are, Porgle and the ment that the best in river farmers a lone make santa Class Franchisching The tenant for the first tenterally bling a law lue Parce R. Ja I r tho maiss

Dime School Series-Dialogues.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 7.

The earth-child in fairy-in .d. For girls
Twenty years hence. Two females, one mal.
The way to Windmain. For two males.
Woman. A poesic passage at words. Two bo 4.
The Ologies. A Colloquy. For two males.
How the control of the cont

Two views of life. Colloquy. For two females. The rights of music. For two females. A hopeless case. A query in verse. Two girls. The would be school-teacher. For two males. Come to life too soon. For three males. I ight o'clock. For two little girls. I is dignity. A colloquy. For two boys. Grief two expensive. For two males. Hamlet and the ghost. For two persons. Little red risting hood. For two temples. New application of an old rule. Boys and girls. Colored cousins. A colloquy. For two males.

DIME DIAL TRUES No. 8.

The fairy School. For a number of girls.
The enrolling officer. Three wis and two boys. I has been buildenthusisst. For three girls.
The girl of the period. For three girls.
The fowl rebellion. Two males and or family.
Slow bet sure. Several mules and two decays.
Caudic's velocipeds. One mule and two.
The figures. For several small children.
The trial of Peter Sloper. For seven boys.

Getting a photograph. Males and females.
The society for general improvement. For girls,
A nobleman in degnice. Three girls, six boys.
Gent expectations. For two boys.
Play's exchool. Five females and four males.
Cloth's for the heathen. One male, one females.
A had tree. For three boys.
Ghost. For ten females and one male.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 9.

Advertising for help. For a number of females. America to Septend, greeting. For two bo... The old and the new. Four females one male. Choice of trades. For two females. The hand og. For two females. The victim. For four females and one male. The duelist. For two less.

The true philosophy. For females and males. A good education. For two females.

The law of human kindness. For two females. Sported children. For a mixed school. Brutus and Castins.

Lanus and Aufidius.

Lanus and Aufidius.

Lanus and Mafidius.

Lanus and M

DIME DIALOGUES No. 10.

Mrs. Mark Twain's shoe. One mate, one female. The old fleg. School fest val. For three boys. The court of felly. For six boys and six girls. Seandal For numerous males and females. The light of love. For two boys. The light of love. For two boys. The deaf uncle. For three boys. A discussion. For two boys.

The rehearent. For a school.

The true way. Furthree boys and one girl.

A practical life less in. For three girls.

The monk and the soldier. For two boys.

1776-1976. School festival. For two girls.

Lord Dandreury's Visit. 2 male; and 2 females.

Witches in the cream. For 3 girlt and 3 boys.

Frenchman. Charade. Numerot's characters.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 11.

Appearances are very deceitful For six boys. The conundrum family. For no and female. Caring B tay. Three makes and four females. Inck and the beaustalk. For five connectors. The way to do it and not to do it. I females. How to become healthy, etc. Male and female. I conly true life. For two girls.

I. Gustavas Vasa and to see a.

I. Gustavas Vasa and to see a.

II. Tameriano and Bajazet.

Fashionable dissipation. For two little girls. A school charade. For two boys and two Cirls. Jenn ingelow's "Songs of Seven." Sevi... ED. A debate. For four boys. Ragged Dick's lesson. For three boys. School charade, with tableau. A very questionable story. For two boys. A sell. For thr e males. The real gentleman. For two boys.

DIME DIALOGUES NO. 12.

Yankee assurance. For several characters, Boarders wanted. For several characters, When I was young. For two girls.
The most precious heritage. For two boys.
The double cure, Two males and four females, The flower-gardon fairies. For five little gir.
Lomina's novel. Three males and two females, ileware of the widows. For three girls

A family not to pattern after. Ten characters. How to manage. An acting character. The vacation ecapade. Four boys and tencher. That naughty boy. Three females and a male. Mad-cap. An acting character. Acting provers. All is not gold that glitters. Acting provers. Sic transit gloria mundi. Acting character.

DIME DIALOGUES NO. 13.

Two o'clock in the morning. For three males, An indignation meeting. For several females, Before and behind the scenes. Several character. The noblest boy. A number of boys and teacher. Blue Beard. A dress place. For girls and boys. Not so bad as it seems. For several characters. A curbetone moral. For two males and female. Some vs. sentiment. For parlor and exhibition.

Worth, not wen'th. For four boys and a teacher.

No such word as fail. For several mass.

The several mass.

Two males and a female.

Old Nubly, the fortune-teller. For three girls.

The state. For several little poys.

I ther is lead. For several facts girls.

A practical thestration. For two beys and girls.

Dime School Series-Dialogues

DIME DIALGGUES No. 14.

Mrs. Jonas Jones. Three gents and two ladies. The born genius. For lour gents. More than one fistener. For four gents and lady. t Who ca carrie is net. For three guls. The right not to be a pauper. For two boys. Woman mature will out. For a gi la' school. Benedict and bacaelor. For two boys, The to a control of five persons, The surprise party. For six lit le girls. A practical demonstration. For three boys.

Refinement, Acting character, Several characters Conscience, the arbiter. For lady and gent. How to make mothers happy. For two boys. A conclusive argument. For two girls. A woman's blindness. For three girls. Rum's work (Temperance) For four gents. The tatal mistake. For two young ladies. Eyes and note. For one gent and one lady. Retribution. For a number of boys.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 15.

The factor and a Numerous characters, A p t a perplexities. For all gentlemen. A nome care. For to 0 laures and one gent The good there is in outh. A number of boys. Contlemen or in assay. For two boys. The little philosopher. For two little girls. Aunt Policy's lesson. For four ladies. A wind-tail. Acting characle. For a number. Will it pay 1 ker two beyon.

The heir at-law. For numerous males. Len't berieve what you hear. For three ladies. A safet, rule. For three ladies. e chief's resolve. Extract. For two males. Testing her friends. For governl characters, The loreigner's tombies. For two ladies. The cut without an owner. Several characters. Natural selection. For three gentlemep.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 16.

P Ily Ann. For four ladies and one gentleman. The meeting of the winds. For a school. The good they did. For any bidies. The boy who wins. For six gentlemen. Good-by day. A colloquy. For three girls. The sick well man, For three boys, The investigating committee. For nine ladies. A " corner" in sogues. For four boys,

The imps of the trunk room. For five girls. The bonsters. A Colloquy. For two fittle girls. Kitty's funeral. For several little gires. Stratagem. Charade. For several characters. Testing her scholars. For numerous scholars. The world is what we make it. Two girls. The old and the new. For gentleman and lady.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 17.

LITTLE FOLKS' SPEECHES AND DIALITY ES.

To be happy you must be good. For two little girls and one boy. Evanescent glory, For a bevy of boys. The little peacemaker. For two little girls. What parts friends. For two little girls. Martha Washington tea party. For five little girls in old-time costume The evil there is in it. For two young boxs. Wise and toolish little girl. For two girls. A child's inquiries. For small child and teacher, The cooking club. For two girls and others. How to do it. For two boys, A hundred years to come. For boy and girl. Don't trust fices. For several small boys. Above the skies. For two small girls. The true heroman. For three little boxs. Give us little boys a chance; The story of the plum pudding; I'll be a mau; A little girl's rights speach; Johnny's opinion of grandmothers; The boasting hen; He knows der rest; A annall boy's view of corns; Robby's sermon; Nobody's child; Nutting at grandpa Gray's; Little boy's view of how Columbus discovered America; I ittle girl's view; Litthe boy's speech on time; A little boy's pocket; The undnight murder; Robby Rob's second sermon; How the baby came; A boy's observations; The new state; A mother's love; The creewnin' glory; Baby Lulu; Josh Billings on the bumble-bee, wren, alligator; Died yesterday; The chicken's mistake; The heir apparent; Deliver us from evil; Don't want to be good; Only a drunken fellow; The two little robins; Be slow to condemn; A nonsense tale; Little hoy's declamation; A . child's desire; Bogus; The goblin cat; Ruba-dub; Calumny; Little chatterbox; Where are they; A boy's view; The twenty frogs. Going to school; A morning bath; The garl of Dundee; A fancy; in the sunlight; The new laid egg; The little a us tran ; fare Bon; Pottery-man; Then and now.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 18.

Fairy wishes. For several characters. No rose without a thorn, 2 maies and 1 female. Too greedy by half. For three males. One good turn deserves another. For 6 ladies. Courting Melinda. For 3 boys and 1 lady. The new scholar. For several boys. The little intercessor. For four indies, Antecedenta- For 8 gentlemen and 3 ladies.

Give a dog a bad name. For four gentlemen. Spring-time wishes. For six little girls. Lost Charlie; or, the gipsy's revenge. For namerous characters. A little tramp. For three little boys, Hard times. For 2 gentlemen and 4 ladies. The leason well worth learning. For two males and two females.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 19.

An awful mystery. Two females and two males. The wind is it betons. For four ladies. Contentment. For five little boys, Who are the saints? For three young g ris. California uncle. Three males and three females. Mad with too much lore. For three males. Be kind to the poor. A little folks', play. How people are insured. A "duet." The smoke fiend. For four boys. A kindergarten dialogue. For a Christmas Fes- and two females. tival. Personated by seven characters. The rue of study. For three girls.

Remember Benson. For three mans. Modern education. Three males and one females The fairy's warning. Dress piece. For two girls. Annt Eunice's experiment. For several. Mayor. Acting characle. For four characters. The invatorious G G. Two females and one male. We'll have to mortgage the farm. For one mail An old fashiened duet. I he auction. For numerous characters.

Dimo School Sories-Dialogues.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 20.

The wrong man. Three mains and three females | An air castie. For five mates and three females Afternoon cales. For two little garas-Ned's present. For four boye. Judge not. For teacher and saveral acholars. Telling dreams. For four little folas. Fixed by love. For two boxs. At stray I dentity. I we makes and three femals Come trend English. For 3 mates and I temale. A little Vesuvius. For six little girls. "Sold." For three boys.

City manners and country hunris. For three girls and one boy. The sally dispute. For two girls and teacher. Not one there! For four unde characters. foot-print. For numerous character. the strand at The Salar Streemales. A cure for good. One lady and two gentiemen. The credulous wise-acre. For two majes.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 21.

A successful langt' in party. I read end On of debt out of danger. For three males and Cinderelta. For several children. three females. L. Monthe Claim and H. I. Prisa - Hrea. Il so she made him propose. A dast. I was restored and billy me in a way of see an investigation Evidence enough. For two males. Worth and wealth. For four females, Waterfall. For several.

11. the ten Tofarmales. for the title, and the tree form form We a to e. It is let a chemin A sugged recovery. For three males. a transfer for the first the first terms and the first terms and the first terms are the first terms and the first terms are the first terms and the first terms are t Counting chickens before they were hatched. For four males.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 22.

The Dark Cup' l, or, the mistakes of a morning. Citavia's banquet. For a number of girls, For three gentlemen and two buties. That Ne'er-do-well; or, a brother's lesson. For A rainy day; or, the a hool-girl philosophers. two formalos. Hg. art. of the new out a For two girls. Strange advectures. For two boys, The king's supper. For four girls, A . Colore remains in the common to require In the little doctor. For two tiny girls. bre. wat, For four boys, Doxy's diplomacy. 3 females and incidentals. A May day. For three little gir s. A . machman; or, the outwitted aunt. For two Franches ablime to the ridiculous. For 14 males ladies and one gentleman.

Boys will be boys. For two boys and one girl. For three young ladies. God is love. For a number of scholars, The way he managed. For 2 males, 2 females, Fandango. Various characters, white and other A sweet revenge. For four boys. lieart not face. For five boys.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 23.

Rhods Hunt's remedy. For 3 fe vales, I male. Hans Schmidt's recommend. For two maies, Cleers and Griffic Fortsolt, book, The phantom doughnuts. For six foundles. Does it pay! For six males, Company address and or the figures. two males, two females and two children. The glad days. For two little bove. This restance Mr. From I or I wale, 5 females, I - reverget e. releven males. The real cost. For two girls.

A bear garden. For three males, two females. The busy bees. For four little girls. Ch. A. the fortune was an eterm. School time. For two little girls. Death scene. 2 principal characters and adjuncta-F - D. id. Several characters, male and for maie. Confound Miller. For three males, two famales. Pedants all. For four females.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 24.

The goddese of liberty. For nine young ladies. The three graces. For three little girls. The music director. For seven males, A strange secret. For three girls. An unjust man. For four mules. The shop girl's v'ctory. I male, 8 females.
The payeneticles. Mean is no word for it. For four ladies. Withmateau Aummont of contaction, both sores, Blessed are the perconnikers. Seven young girls.

The six brave men. For six boys. Have you heard the news? The true queen. Two young girls. A slight mistake. 4 maies, I temule, and sevferal auxiliaries. Lazy and busy. Ten little fellows. Third and i vrg. 1 go then an, 1 I trie girl. That posted card. 3 ladies and 1 gentleman. Matter floors and her household. A whole school fancy dress dialogue and travestie.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 25.

The smiesies of the defectables and les misera' es, play two ladies and two gentlemen. What each would nave. 6 mile begate. Suchine through the clouds. For four ladies. Terratarneod. For four ha to The hours. For twelve little girls. In a cors and out. For tive more onyl. In als. Fr a ser , some finales. The pound of flesh. For three bays. Evente file within foresters. Godnita, Fra : er / . A friend. For a number of little girls.

The true use of wealth. For a whole school, Little wise heads. For four little gires. Crabtree's grooing. Several characters. I service the hears of all excesses The medge, A crooked way made straight. One rentamen Mint tellet soull's How to " brenk in " young hearts. Two lauler R' a what faile and a

The above books are sold by Newad alers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, 10 c nts each.

REABLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 95 William St., N. To

DIME DIALOGUES No. 26.

Poor cousins. Three ladies and two gentlemen. |The lesson of mercy. Two very small girls. Mountains and mole-hills. Six ladies and several Practice what you preach. Four ladies, apectators.

A test that did not full. Six bovs.

Two ways of seeing things. Two little girls. Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. Four ladies and a boy. All is fair in love and war. 3 ladies, 2 gentlemen. Embodied sunshine. Three young ladies. How uncle Josh got rid of the logacy. Two males, How Jim Peters died. Two males. with several transformations.

Politician. Numerous characters.

The canvassing agent. Two males and twe famales.

Grub. Two males.

A slight scare. Three females and one mala

DIME DIALOGUES No. 27.

Patsey O'Dowd's campaign. For three males The street girl'a good angel. For two ladies and and one female.

Plasty inferences not always just. Numerous "That augrateful little nigger." For two males.

Discontented Annie. For several girls.

A double surprise. Four males and one female.

What was it! For five ladies.

What will cure them! For a lady and two boys. An enterced cure. For several characters. Independent. For numerous characters.

Each senson the best. For four boys-fried and found wanting. For several males. A boy's plot. For several characters.

two little girls.

If I had the money. For three little girls. Appearances are deceitful. For several ladies and one gentleman.

Love's protest. For two little girls.

Those who preach and those who perform. For three males.

A gentle conquest. For two young girls.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 28.

A test that told. For six young lains and two Norsonn for the done. For three little bays. gentlemen.

Organizing a debating society. For four boys. The awakening. For four little girls. The rebuke proper. For 3 gentlemen, 2 ladies.

Exercising an evil spirit. For six ladies. Both sides of the fence. For four males. The spirits of the wood. For two troupes of girls. An agreeable profession. For several characters.

Arm-chair. For numerous characters. Measure for measure. For four girls, Saved by a dream. For two males and two females. An infullible sign. For four boys. A good use for money. For six little girls.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 29.

Who shall have the dictionary f. For six typical Simple Simon. For four little boys. male characters and two females. The test of bravery. For four boys and teacher. The awestest thought. For four little girls. Fortune's wheel. For four male characters. The little restlictes. For six little girls.

No references. Six gentlemen and three ladies. An amazing good boy. One male, one female. What a visitation did. For several ladies.

The red light. For four males, two females. The inhuman monster. 6 ladies, 1 gentleman. Three little fools. For four small boys. The yes and no of smoke. For three little boys. Beware of the dog! For three ladies and three " dodgers." Joe Hunt's hunt. For two boys and two girls,

DIME DIALOGUES No. 30.

Rage. For aix males.

.n. isible heroes. For five young ladies. · colored " lecture. For four males. .. hes. For five little boys.

book at home. For three little girls. Fisherman's luck. For two males and three The test that told. For five males,

Why he didn't hire him. For several "char-, two ladies. acters."

A fortunate mistake. For six young indies, one The teacher's ruse. For ten boys and three little girl and a boy. An alphabetical menagerie. For a whole school, Colleguy of nations. For eleven personators,

The nigher education. For eight boys. The vicinal tudes of a milliner. For six females.

Cat and dog. For two little ones, The resthete cured. For 2 ladies and 3 gentleme. Jim Broderick's lesson. For two boys. The other side of the story. For five females. Weeing by proxy. For three gentlemen and Learning from evil. For five boys.

Additional personations for Goddess of Liberty? A scenic piese in Dialogues No. 24.

The above books are add by Newsdealurs everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any Midrose, on receipt of price, 10 cents each.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.

STANDARD DIME SPEAKERS-50 to 80 Fisces in Bach Volume.

DIME AMERICAN SPEAKER, No. 1.

Young America, Remary o. Was lington A. Ware cor word, Plan for the Maine car, Ir is not obality, A .. on the hatt eller, to 10 pe netal day, The limit of all and to go to , 1 1 4 c . . . 1 21 p Confrond Ly, he og di y Iman, Carritrofthe Kovs'a Virti being ret is it to war, A net on Wang Theoreting True mannood, Ten in stary of life, The part of the party Lau teday getting

LWO

l Dai

08

.08

01

Burly ret raig and risig, J. John oralesa, 3 mile .. 10. litte. gince the bala c' Anol. b. a late vister, I st make I'm till, tota Mr. Mcosh, Prof. on phrenology, I have I have, if while is a single of Laboration b. y a sy. tal,

A DISSUIT CATO, Ma worthing t, . in this temp, Livery & Comments therty Fo . A.m. pound fool to angre of 1 got brigance, in a continuous, fate The transfer of the english that the car is shippy, " . O . J ME TAME, Bickle 4 tolo of a mouse, (1.1. (f) raon Land word of locating Great lives imperiahable I temper more vitor ton y g Landard property. form to Pe de a, a continue of the riving 15 to be I know to kleich A Viscott He late bulleting 1 ed filetry ". a boff to coverne !. Wounday Ainna. . - I willon of 1801. A selection where SFIARER, No. 2.

Ti, nantitaramita, r - 1 5 also Th I a testitus supers, Maranalli persis A satted to fee sity, I have many wrep, (The sty " A 2" TY Landa a feet star 1 I , tepeted at the ... 11.08 ... 18 ... 18 0.1 I . . . Bri ; " Tusky Act to de or co Street vater a weathly. "I no true higher their, The one great tent, Invaligued the bird, that you theny tray, Amount balled, Trestable on well I . r. of it . wolls The bashful man's story Systems of bollef. I my marter of me & limit, Charle r. STATE OF THE liter yoft, lev, 17 Car x 17 27 10 10 10 lating the s Literation 56 mil. - 1279 Oregon a materianes.

Cour Haver I Perry, ry franch, THE LEW S. C. 1 - the condition of the Mrs firste 45 + 1 mile Halan Co, Tit milt I hadded, 1. 15 .. 1 1 . 1 . Craws or good of U.S. thir care y land, last the women to war I. " 15 , 15, (i) [Ju n,

If ir for w'll out, Site of the last of the last a alyron to Deeds of kindness, G: Islenia All colors grant, to distribution gle. CILIA, in a sol and tree, ...tell elice, . : sage . I this dange . O. 11 1 50 110 Acres allegate

Amarica to the world, Live of contactly, Right of sulf-preserva- Christy's speech, Church Be, A Kest comm's appeal, B and or General, Kentic v stenul ut, I mindity is treason, The alarum, April 15th, 1861, Trottef'th, Lue proclous heritage, [

The Irish observats trataspana, fin. Line I ... I make to Union Square speeches, The Union, Our country's call, I've story a fer touck tree, Long and my half,

If the four flue, I.c. let ber sanirons, by section time to We owe to the Union, Last Fore ! of Displace! A. Donant I to that the total total Citagle of a factor of The New Year and the A foreigner's tribute. King Cotton, 1 x x 1 2 pt 73 p La trade lo 1000

Friedom the watchword Duty of Christian patrial , l'attacy Dan's oration, A leaker or bert, I somme of a colery. [Union, The little Zounve. utholic cather it, "Le " Specalators."

DIME COMIC SPEAKER, No. 4. R'shevergous on the was P n. A some of with.

A reb m'y considered, A lexan Falsg'am. I all the tee, I be to be the I'm r tak tele . . an, A. Wari's idvice, Bazfuz on Pickwick, Rowald Janes, Ii ppiness, 1) 3,79

Chacusains, No. 1. Pran tolains If, Prict. il parenom, y, Beautiful Cabbage, 141 wible people. Fundy fring

I'm in antebank, () its , t seroit, I within oh the leet, Old dog Jock, The fishes' toilet, Commerfiele What is a bachelor like t Crockett to office-seekers Lecture on locomotion, Who is my opponent? [Mrs.Caudison Umbr'ila

P Utical stump speech, W -t', trop to Richm'd, a not term bur, No. 2, a sewent the bottom fierra : is I to state to got or ?. Sara a definition of willy Lalu of a hat, The debating club, Allate , but ! D.

DIME ELOCUTIONIST, No. 5.

SEC. I. PRINCIPLES OF TRUE ENUNCIATION. -Faults in enunciation; how to avoid them. Special rules and observations.

S ' II. THE ART OF ORATORY .- Sheridan's L. s of the Passions. Tranquellity, Cheerfulne Mirth, Raillery, Buffoonery, Joy, Delight, Gravity, Inquiry, Attention, Modesty, Per-Plexity, Pity, Grief, Melancholy, Despair, Fear, Shame, Remorse, Courage, Boasting, Pride, Obstinacy, Authority, Commanding, Forbidding, Amering, Denying, Difference, Agreeing, Exhorting, Judging, Approving, Acquitting, Condemning, Teaching, Pardoning, Arguing, Dismissing, Refusing, Granting, Dependence, Veneration, Hope Desire, Love, Respect, Giving, Won ter, Admiration, Crathade, Carineity, Persussion, Tempting, Promising, difference, course limetration, differ, our

SEC. III. THE COMPONENT ELEMENTS OF AN ORATION.—Rules of Composition as applied to Words and Phrases, viz.: Purity, Propriety, Precision. As applied to Sentences, viz.: Length of Sentence, Clearness, Unity, Strength. Figures of Speech; the Exordium, the Narration, the Proposition, the Confirmation, the Refutation, the Peroration.

SEC. IV. REPRESENTATIVE EXERCISES IN PROSE AND VERSE. - Transition: A Plea for the Ox; Falstaff's Solilogny on Honor; the Burial of Lincoln; the Call and Response; the Bayonet Charge; History of a Life; the Burle; the Bella: Byron; Macbeth and the Daggar; Hamlet's Solileguy; Old Things; Look Upward; King William Rufus; the Eye; an Essa onto hiusik; Discoverios of Galileo. . SEC. V. Ozduby arming or Good Authorston

DIME HUMOROUS SPEAKER, No. G.

A and story, A atring of onione, A traggic at ary, Cats, Courtship, Debt. Devils, Dow, Jr.'s loctures, Lyo and echo, Fas tionable women, Fern thiatica, C I to a true ter to the first terms Schlaggenlichter's smike Parody on " Araby's The mysterious guest, Hosen Biglow's opinions daughter,"

How the money goes, 'Hun- 1-do-ri's Fourth of Right names, July oration, III you mean no, say no, The ager, Jo Boss on leap year, Lay of the henpecked, Lot Skinner's diegy, ! Matrimony, Nothing to do, Old Grimes's son,

11-18

Poetry run mad, Scientific lectures, The cockney, The confish, Fate obSergeant Thin, The features' quarrel, Hamerican voodchuck, | Vagaries of popping the Ohl Caudle's umbrella, The harp of a thousand 1 527 11,500 " Paddle your own ca- The last of the sarpints, Yankes double Aladding The march to Mescow,

The sea-serpent, The secret, i me shoemnker, I i mseful doctor, The waterfall, To the buckelors' unload league, 'United States Presidents question, What I wouldn't be, 7 · Moskeetare, Ben 31.44.

3 .

A I.

1 ...

1 .4

D.

Al

11

11 :

31

y 17

1 30

A

DILLE STANDARD SPEAKER, No. 7.

The pump,

The world we live in, Woman's claims. Authors of our liberty, The real conqueror, The citizen's heritage, Italy. The mechanic, Nature & Nature's God, The modern good, [min.] I check, Ossimi's address to the regy thoughts, Independence bell-1777, The fuller' man, John Burms, Gettysburg, Life, No sect in heaven, Miss Prude's tes-party, The unbeliever,

The power of an idea, The two lives, The beneficence of the fue true scholar, Suffrage . Drenn - the revolet, in a therm, The prettiest hand, t'aradoxical, The Idler,

| Judges not intallible, | My country, How Cyrus land the cabe code little of success to Wint is war f April delication Ireland, tile Jory, the miller, The people always con- The race, Music of labor, Prossia and Austria, | Withings The Blarney stone, The student of Bonn,

The Bible, The purse and the sword jerime, True moral courage, quer, My Deborah Lee. The pin and needte, The modern Puritan, Immerbility of the south Occupation, Heroism and daring, I The broken hou chold, A shot at the decanter.

DIME STUMP SPEAKER, No. 8.

on the situation, woman's suffrage, Life's what you make it, Farmers, Where's my money?

Hon. J. M. Stubbs' views Good-nature a blessing, America, Sermon from hard-shell "Right of se e-sion" a Broken resolutions, Hans Schwackheimer on Tail-enders, | Bantist, Life's sunset, The value of money, All for a nomination, Meteoric disquisition, Old ocean, [sex., Be sure you are right, The sen, the sen, the open Be of good cheer, Appeal in benuit of Am. Unjust national acquira The starbangled spanner Crabbed folks, [shrow, Miseries of war. [liberty | The amateur coachman, Stay where you belong. Tanding a masculine A Lay Sermon, . The true greatness of our A dronomical, Speech from conscience, N. England & the Union, The moon, Man's relation to society. The unseen buttle-field, Duties of American citis House-cleaning, The limits to happiness, Plea for the Republic, . The man,

Human nature, Lawyers, Wren, of the Indiana, A Frenchman's dinues, [country, A dream, [fullacy, Temptations of cities, There is no death, Папсел, A fruitful discourse, The cold water man, Permanency of States. Liberty of speech, [zens, John Thompson's dan'r. It is not your business.

DIME JUVENILE SPEAKER, No. 9.

A boy's this sorby, Heral, Triw. Same "prot it, The see soul car, A valediction, Popping corn, The editor, The same, in thyme, The fairy shoemaker, What was learned, Press on, Title horne. The snake in the grass, Tale of the tropics, Bromley's speech, The same, second extract Repentance, The fisher's child. Shakapearian scholar, A Maiden's paster of life, Night after Christmas, A HUXBURA. From for shatur,

Playing ball, Ah, why, Live for something, Lay of the ben-packed, The outside dog, Wolf and lamb, Lion in love, Sick lion, Country and town mice, Rain, Man and woman, Home, The Letus planter, Little things, A Baby's soliloquy, A pien for eggs, Humbug patriotism, Short legs,

How the raven became Nothing to de, blact. A mother's work, The same, Who rules, 4 sheep story, A little correspondent, Frogs asking for a king, One good turn deserves to a sour a, My dream, I'll nes \ use tobacco, A ne . The old backelor, Frayer to light, Little Jun, Angelina's lament, JohnnyShrimps on boots The ocean storm, Mercy, Choice of hours, Poor Richard's sayings, | Base-ball,

Il mesty best policy, It wen, Ho for the fields, Fashion on the brain, On Shanghais, A smile, [another, | Homeopathic soup, Nose and eyes, Minit, come A hundred years 12 The madman and hig Little sermons, [razor, Suuffles on electricity, The two cradles, Do thy little, dost well, Little puse, Shrimps on amusements; Who killed Tom Reper, Presemption for applied

DIME SPREAD-EAGLE SPEAKER, No. 10.

Ben Buster's cration. Mans Von Spiegel's 4th, Daking a shweat, Josh Billings's advice, A hard-shell sermen, The boots, I e squaser, Nonh and the devil, A lover's luck, H . . a A : ns. Proceed on an artist and Original Mand Muller, Distinction's deadwant Simitti. Guskalina Pendibus, A stock of notions,

110

Speaking for the sheriff, (Drum-head sermors, Toca and now, Josh B Hings' lecturing, Luke Lather, Doctor DeBuster's ann't The hog, Consignments, Hard lives, Din Bryant's speech, A cole red view, Nobe . 1, Inges, Frain of circumstances Sut Lovengood, stio d advice, · The itching palm, Schnitzerl's philosopede. " Woman's rights," Jack Spratt, New England tragedy, The ancient bachelor, Jacob Whittle's speech, derks prognosticates, A word with Snooks, A mule ride, Josh Billings on Lus-The American ensign.

Il Trovatore, Kissing in the street, Scandalous, singhtly mixed, lite office-seeker, (Ha bachelors, Woman, The Niam Niama People will talk, Swackhamer's ball, Who wouldn't be fire'n. Den't depend on daddazers, Music of labor, DIME DEBATER AND CHAIRMAN'S GUIDE, No. 11.

T .-- DEBATING HOCIETY, S. for at to ', C of the China Br. Laws of, Russell room only Local rules of order, Lac al Tules of debute, tents for discussion. II - HOW TO DABLIE. 11 4 - 10 to 1 4 K - 1 debaters, 1 the San The logic of debate, The rhetoric of debate, Maxims to observe, The preliminary pre-Thish, Order of argument,

I remanent - redings, team be treated, The "Question," How sidering questions, to be consider d, dights to the floor, Process to crater it is of a speaker as Their powers, " diescher e lee I'. it ing yeas and nays, When not to sit, Interrupting a vote, Organization of Delibrative Bodies, Con How to report, General Assemblies, | whole,

Preliminary tien, The order of business, Order of business and Considering reports, pa- Debate in full; THERE PAREL 1 e "town on. ' How Of substainer motions, The due order of con-Committees, Objects of a committee, How named, Rules of order and pro-Cedure, ventions, Annital or The committee of the organiza- Miscellaneous, I reatment of petitions, organiza- The decorum of debate, thata to a chairman. IV. -- DEPAIRM. Which is the greatest benefit to his country -the warrier, stutusman, or poel f Debates in brief; I. Is the rending of works of fiction to be condemned f II. Are lawyers a benefit or a curse to society f Y .- QUOTATIONS AND PHLAGES

DIME EXHIBITION SPEAKER, NO. 12.

The erator of the day, The heathen Chines, The land we love, Jim Bludso, Be true to yourself,! Ah Sin's reply, A plea for a tles, trice sichery, Free Italy, Italy's alien ruler, DOWET, The treaty of peace The national flag, (1814),

The critical moment, The cast and the west, Are we a nation i Social science, Influence of liberty. The patriot's choice, The Star acien-The right of the people, Manifest destiny, The crowning glory, The pumpkin, When you're down, The curse of one man What England has done The right of neutrality, Our true future,

Gravelotte, All hail! Is there any money in it ! Emancipation of science, What I wish, Spirit of forgiveness, Amnesty and love, Beauty. Song of labor, Let it alone ! Mand Muller alter Hans Breitman, What is true happiness. Story of the twing The Irish of it. A par- A cold in the nose, ody,

What we see in the sky. A lecture, Good manners, A ballad of Lake Erle, Suffrage, The Caucasian race, A review of situation, Little Breeches, Disconcerted candidate, Huns Donderbeck'swedding, A victim of toothache, My uncle Adolphus.

DIME SCHOOL SPEAKER, No. 13.

Tropics uncongenial to greatness, Live for something, Civil and recigious liberty. Second raviow of the grand army, Dishonesty of politics, The great commoner, Conrecter and achieve- A catastrophe, ment, i. Et 1 . as. L. 19 "It m g t have been," Don't strike a mes Whet-GOTTON

Fanny Butterfly's ball, The treasures of the 'ivil service reform, deep, | at ... is fre alt, · ch, e award the true ar- The saideath, b. Aristocracy, RaronGrimalkin's death, To whom shall we give Ohed Snipkius, Cheerfulness, Miller Last By The last lay of the Min-Christianity our strni, the unimaky levers,

The true gentleman, The tragic pas "ARRATH SCHOOL PIECES The heart, A cry for life, Gnarled lives, A good life, thanksi Resolution, Never mind, The l'he, WALK. The want of the heart, Who allows either

The midnight train, The better view, Dothy little-do it well. Jesus forever, The world, Beautiful thoughts, A picture of life, Pe true to yourself, Yourg man, et als a F t to gospel of antenna Speak not harshly, COUTAGE, bul. The eternal hymna, Live for good.

DIME LUDICROUS SPEAKER, No. 14.

Counting. fligher, The clusing year, The maniac's defease, The hen scratches. Ass and the violinist, Views of married life, Richelors and firts, Job's turkey, A hardshell cermon, My first knile, Der Loddery Dicket. A engui-ballad, Wannar Tis What in matter, Mrs. Jones' pirate, De goose, Touch of the sublime, Blooded Van Snoozie, Blast against tobacco, Tobacco buys, Big geniuses, My first to t Terrible t'-in e, Salver wedding. Prohebishon, Elizabet. Queer people, Billing cue's nose off. Gorden rules, The sugular man, of July oration, Cheer up, Seit-esteem, Buckwhent cakes. The filling, 1 1x 12 11 Hader Coly In wife Contentment, Oa courting. On laughing, the tanner boy, On windmen's rights, The healer, The criminal lawyer. \ isnlind of Alatilda Jano. lastadad of a liber. Co cell I post, of the A dier it g between

KARL PRETZEL'S KOMIKAL SPEAKER, No. 15.

Schandal. Don'd been afraid. (11, 1, 1 Indeinberance, Hope. Das ish vat it ish, Man. A lecture, " Dot musquiter," Dhere vas no crying, Leedle speedches, Pelis, pelis, The puzzled Dutchman, To see ourselves,

! Address to a school, His sphere, Time of the Front The treachery of Jones, Music, siretchen und me go oud Don't call a man a line, 'On lager beer, Bu'st. A " dadect," Leedle gal-child adream Simon Short's son Sam, The best cow languard, Reckermember der poor, F with the Natural history views, ' r r '. The cart before the horse Service Serrowful tale, The lunters' society. Tratient bidgers, Candle's wedding-day, 1). I young viddow, was a cold be as of limit hitly

The Illinois Assembly, Tie cannibal man. S. I glass, Pretzel as a soldier, The raccoon, My childhood, Schneider's ride. a real species tempels to be for ties semkin'. Abner Jones' testimony, By a money changer's. /

DIME YOUTH'S STEAKER, No. 16.

A call to the field, 10 relailers, War, war to the death, Adjuration to duty, The the tore in party A boy's testimony, I have drank my last, Then It be to In fact to the section Life is what we make it, The only true nobility, Taste not,

The evil beast, Help, The hardest lot of all, The curse of rum, 1 atwoders a file, The source of reform, The rum flend, . The in v and it. O. " o by or prays (Tue luebriate's end,

A drunken solilogur. The work to do, To labor is to pray, The Sucressful life, litter trang. Seed-time and harvest, lichabod Siy, or great lesson to learn to allope in. The toper's lament, l God's liquor, Value of life work, " Accept the cituation," Died of whicky, A story with a moral, or elect the stade Invocation to cold water killects of intemperance, the West Hay will Be good to the body. Worth makes the man.

THE DIME ELOQUENT SPEAKER, No. 17.

An adjuration, The kings of business, Purity of apeach, Parson Caldwell. Value freedston, Swelling manhood, Sammer, Woman's love. ne brick layers, Words of silver, Drive on! drive on! The tramp, The State immortal,

The moral factor, . ! Anatomical lecture, | | A thought, Walking with the world Minnetunkee, The only safety, Knowledge, SHORE OF BUT THE TOTAL BILL TOR. liand that rocks world, Stand by the constit'n, | Anatomi | lecture 2, A true friend. The mocking bird, The want of the country The true saviors, The value of virtue, She would be a mason, Evils of ignorance, The use of time, (VILLO II TU)

The printing press, The Sabbath, A blow in the dark, The specier caravan, True fame, Something to shun, Plea for Ireland, Smile where'er you can, Short sermon. lac wo dointer,

The housemaid. The gollin cat, Aristocrats, T'elin handboy, A call t vote, The modern fraud, Running for legislature, To a young man, Hends, The new dispensation, Turning the grindstone

THE DIME CENTENNIAL SPEAKER, No. 18.

Columbia, Washington, Append for liberty, Torre Resistance to oppression Revolutionary soldiers, [Lexlagt w. Patriolism, Green Mountain boys, Eloquence of Otls, Washington, America must be free, Freedom the only hope, Our destiny; Par of Car transit, I've Adam on fing. Lie asternal ve but mby . Te true u .. on, CAPMER IS . CEGUM, Benera of Bunker id. it, to application & a remark in series and them by

The Fourth of July, Warren's address, A call to liberty, terlf day Our responsibility, British barbacity, How freedom is won, Adams and liberty, Our duties. A mereon proposed once it run and his men.

Sink or swim, The buff and blue, The union, Lastrins, y, Our only hope, Declaration of Indep'e. The liberty tell, Washington's attributes New England's dead, , What we are, Our great trust, GOT OFFICE CHE " 21505. Lauking Carkward.

A noble ples, Original Yankee Doodle Wo'fe's address, Water a g for Montg'y The rational cuarra God save the union, Our matal day, The 22d of February, Repeal | repeal ! The true hero, thid it to the es. O in Et la to Listens. L'ario frem's a handred Contracted systles.

DIME SERIO-COMIC SPEAKER, No. 19.

The American phalanx, |Sour grapes, The same, The old cance, Room at the top, New England weather, Judge not thy brother, Bluggs, Leedle Yaweob Strauss, A fable, The tramp's views, Moral littleness, Yawcob Hoffsitegobble. The setting sachem, Street Arab's sermon, At midnight, Address to young ladies, Good-night, A little big man, The tast of friendship, The price of pleasure,

Claws, The unwritten The ager, Fish, The dog St. Bernard, The liberal candidate, A boy's opinion of hous, Good alone are great, The great Napoleon, The two lives, The present age, Truth, The funny man, The little orator, Pompey Squash, Mr. Lo's new version, The venomens worm, The midnight express, Corns, Morality's worst enemy Up early, The silent teacher, The working people, The moneyless man, Strike through the knot, Horses. A protest, An agricultural address, Excelsior, The new scriptures, The trombone, Don't despond, What became of a lie, Now and then, How ub vos dot for high sidered, Enrly rising, Smart boy's opinion, Not so wasy, Dead beat in politics, War and dueling, Fuddy's version of excelsior. The close, hard man, The mill cannot grind, Apples and application, Old Scrooke, Minn, generically con-A chemical wedding.

DIME SELECT SPEAKER, No. 20.

and, Save the Republic, Watches of the night, The closing Year, Wrosg and right road, An enemy to society, Barbara Freitchie, The most precious gift, Intellectual and moral My Esquimanz friend, power, Thanatopsis, New era of labor Work of fulth, A dream, La dame aux enmellas,

Penalty of selfishmes, Lights Out, Clothes don't make the lie is everywhere, man, The last man, Mind your own business Scorn of oflice, My Fourth of July sen- Who are the tree? timents, Story of the little rid hin Bly castle in Spain, Shonny Schwartz, The Indian's wrongs, Address to young men, Beautiful Snow,

Now is the time, Exhortation to patriots, A dream of darkness, Religion the keystone, The city on the hill, How to save the Republic, The good old times, Monmouth, Hope, Moral Desolation, Self-wrident truths, Won't you let my papa. MOTEL Complence the best guide, Whem to honor, The lords of labor, Early rising, Pumpernickei and Pepschikoff, Only a tramp, Cage them, Time's soliloque, Find a way or make it. The musquite hunt, The hero.

DIME FUNNY SPEAKER, No. 21.

dates, Clory mit fer Sthars und Sthripes, Terence O'Dowd's pat- On some more hash, riotism, tion, Farmer Thornbush on iools, The fiddler, The regular season, Dot baby off mine, Bluggs once more, Views on agriculture,

Colonel Sellers eluci-|One hundred years ago, |The new De 'sperience ob de Reb-'rend Quacka Stroug. A dollar or two, Where money is king, The lime-kiln club ora- Professor Dinkelspeigel- I kin nod trink to-nighd, Jim Bludso; or, the Konsentrated wisdum, mince pie, The school-boy's lament, John Jenkins's sermon, ye winged winds," A foggy day, (Vulcan,) mythology The new (Pan,) The new mythology Thermopyle, (Bacchus,) man on the origin of The new church doctrine, Wilyum's watermillion. The manac's defense, Joseph Brown and the Josiah Axtell's oration, Woman, God bl. sa her I Parson Barebones's an Be miserable, athema, A parody on "Tell me Canr Squash on heat, The Cadi's judgment, Frits Valdher is made a That calf. mason.

mythology Joan of Arc, The blessings of Man lite, The people, Cats Prairie Belle, A entastrophic ditty, Dodds versus Daubs, DIME JOLLY SPEAKER, NO. 22.

Frandfather's clock; The delights of Boring, . The XIXth century, Mary's von little ram, A familiar lecture on science, Old and new time, Clayfoot's spirit race, The vilinge school, A sermon for the sisters, De filosofy ob fun, Disappointed di coverer, A heathen's score. Der dog und der lobster, A bathetic ballad, The young tramp. paights of the season,

Josh Billings's views, Bensteses, watermellon. How tew pik out a dog The funny man, How tew pik out a A dark warning. wife, This side and that, Nocturnal mowsings, The lunatic's reverse, The our, Bickbene,

A weak case, They may be happy yet. How tow pik out a Perseus. A "classic," Rigid Information, How tew pik out a kat | Don't give it away, "colored" dissertation An awful warning. An effective appeal, De parson sowed de seed Punpey's Thanksgiving! turkey, The new seasy on man, I

A new declaration . independence, Orpheus, A side view, The jolly old fellow. A Christman walcome, My first cont, The fire-briande, A patriotic "splurge," A The good old thues, indeed! A cong atulatory reminder, Stealing the sacred fire. The story of Prometheus modernized, The owl and the pussycat

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to may address, on receipt of pri a, 10 cents each.

DIME DIALECT SPEAKER, No. 23.

Dat's wat's de matter, [All about a bee, The Mississippi miracle, Scandal, Ven te tide cooms in, Dose lams vot Mary haf Te, pesser vay, man's rights, The home rulers, how Tobias so to speak, they "apakes," Hezekiah Dawson on A parody, Mothera-in-law. The true story of Franklin's kite, I would I were a boy aguin. A pathetic story,

A dark side view, On learning German, Pat O'Flaherty on wo- Mary's shmall vite lamb A healthy discourse, Old Mrs. Grimes, Mars and cats, He didn't sell the farm. Bill Underwood, pilot, Old Granley, The pill peddler's ora- Our candidate's views, tion, Widder Green's Words, the Irishman, Peggy McCann, Sprays from Josh Bil-De circumstances ob de A doketor's drubbles, Bliwation. de sun, That violin, Pienic delights, Dundreary's wisdom, last Plain language by truth- The crow, ful Jane, Latest Chinese outrage, My neighbor's dogs, The manifest destiny of Condensed Mythology, Pictus. The Nereides. Legends of Attica. The stove-pipe tragedy The coming man, Dar's nullin new under The illigant affair at Muldeon's, A Negro religious poem, That little baby round the corner. A genewine inference, An invitation to that bird of liberty, Out west.

DIME READINGS AND RECITATIONS, No. 24.

The Irishman's pane- | The dim old forest, The lightning-rod agent The tragedy at four ace flat, Ruth and Naomi, Carey of Corson, Babies, John Reed, The brakeman at church, Passon Mooah's surmount, Arguing the question Jim Wolle and the cate,

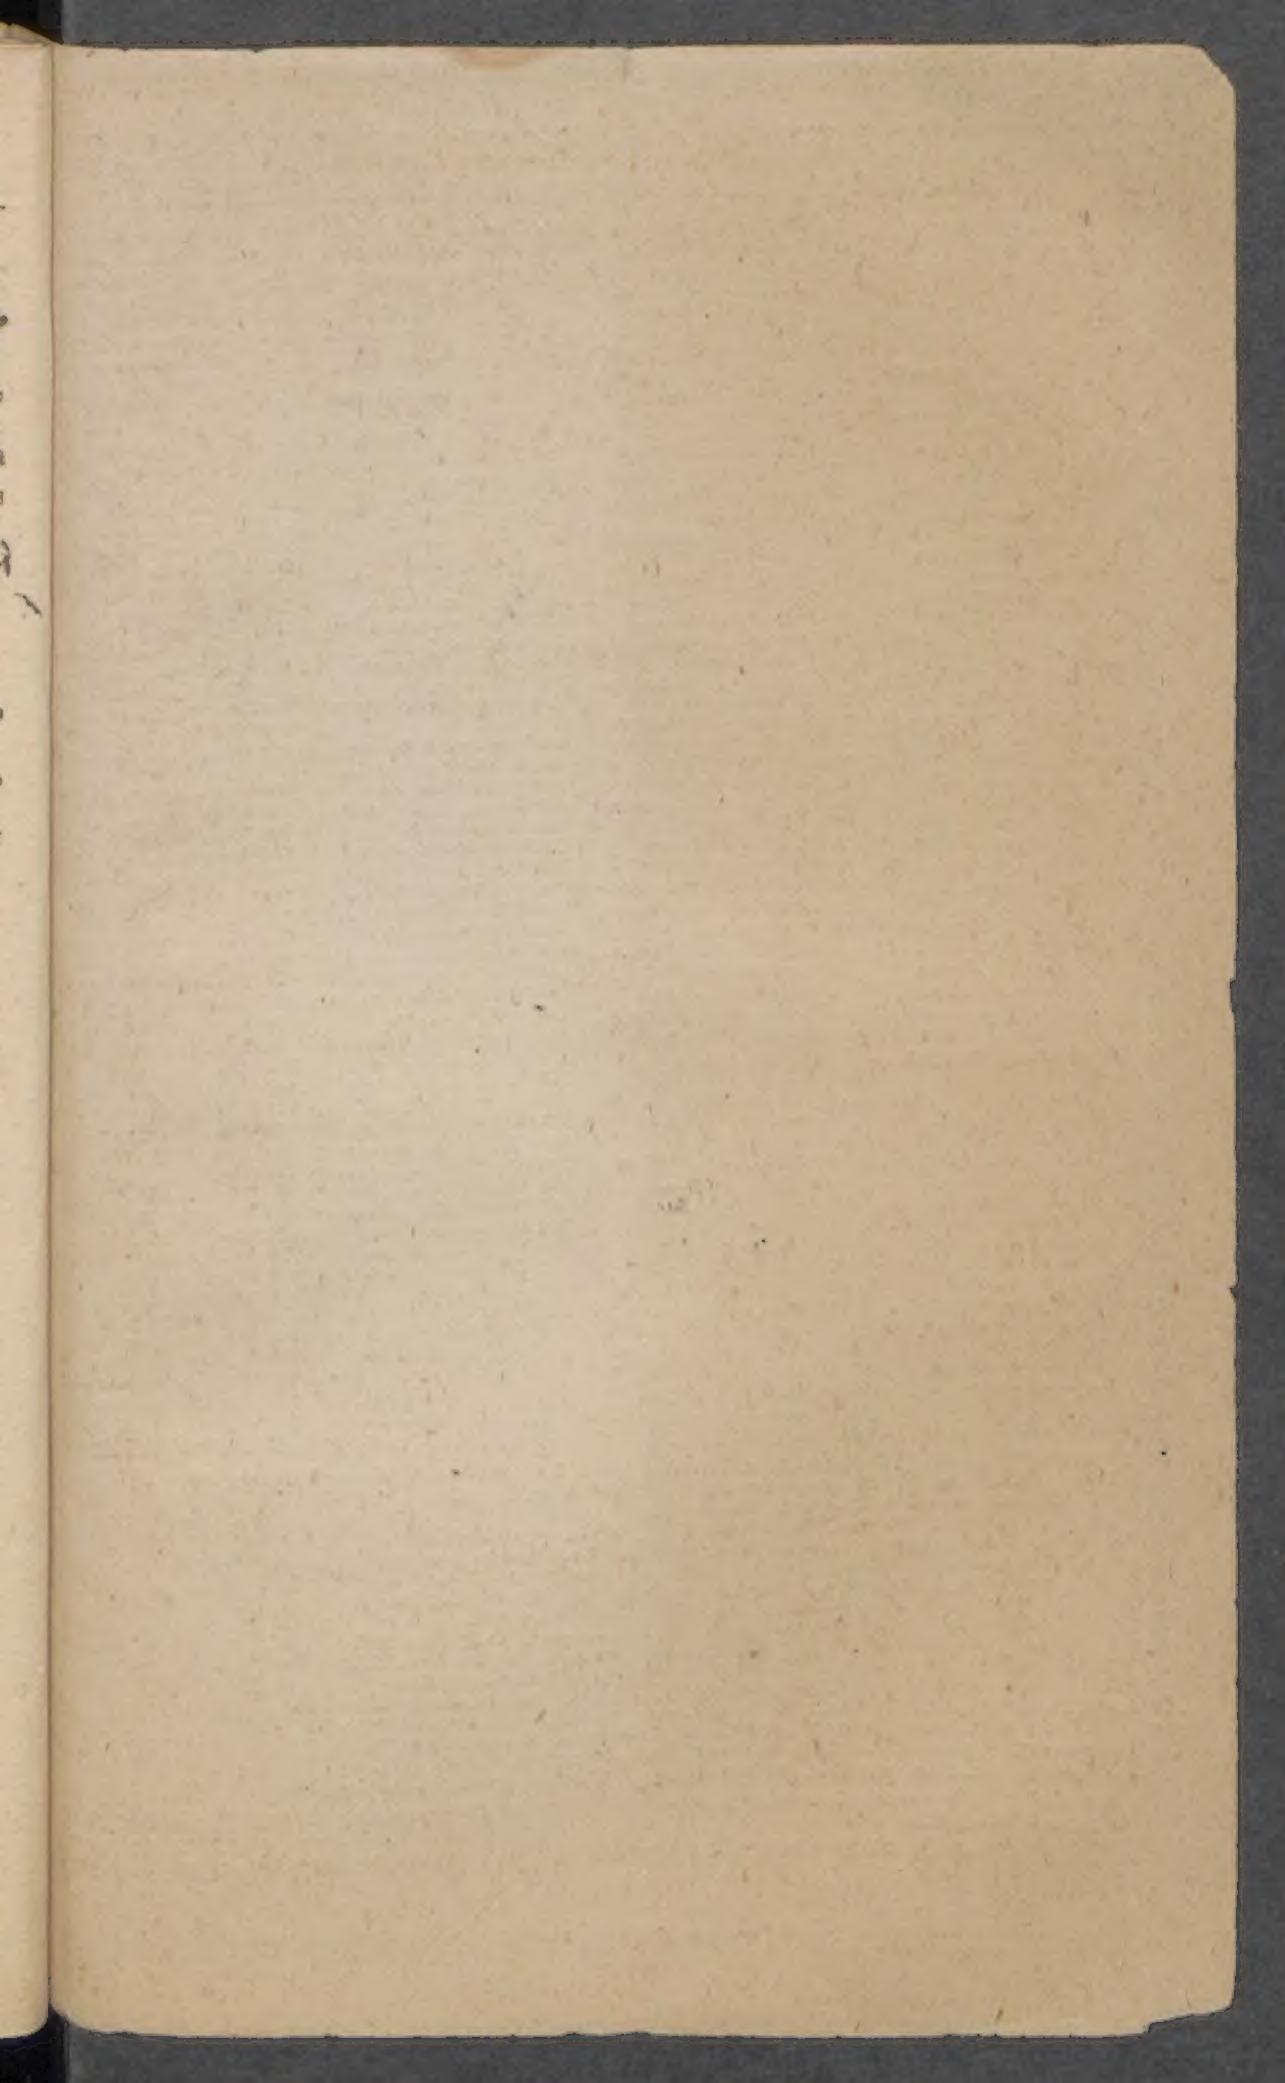

Rasher at home. The Sergeant's story, David and Goliah, Dreaming at fourscore, Rum, Why should the spirit of mortal be proud! The coming mustache, The engineer's story, A candidate for president, Roll call, An accession to the The newsboy, family, home, The donation party, Tommy Taft, A Michigander in France. Not one to spare, Mrs. Breezy's pink lunch, Rock of ages. J. Casar Pompey Squash's sermon, Annie's ticket. Pat's correspondence,

When the cows come | Death of th' owd squire Mein tog Shueid, At Elberon, The cry of womanhood, The judgment day, The burst bubble, Curfew must not ring to-night, The swell, The water mill, Sam's letter, Footsteps of the dead, Charity, Au essay on check.

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, 10 cents each.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.

DIME POCKET NOVELS.

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY, AT TEN CENTS EACH.

Hawkeye Harry. Dead Shot. The Boy Miners. Blue Dick. Nat Wolfe. The White Tracker. The Outlaw's Wife. The Tall Trapper. Lightning Jo. The Island Pirate. The Boy Ranger. 12 Bess, the Trapper. The French Spy. Long Shot. The Gunmaker. Rad Hand. Bun, the Trapper. Wild Raven. The Specter Chief. The Bar-Killer. 21 Wild Nat-Indian Jo. 33 Old Kank, the Ranger. 94 One-Eyed Trapper. 25 Godbold, the Spy. The Black Ship. 27 Single Eye. Indian Jim, The Scout Engle Eye. The Mystic Cance. The Golden Harpoon. The Scalp King. 34 Old Lute. Rainbolt, Ranger. 36 The Boy Pioneer. 37 Carson, the Guide. 38 The Heart Eater. 39 Wetzel, the Scout. The Huge Hunter. Wild Nat, Trapper. 42 Lynx-cap. The White Outlaw. 44 The Dog Trailer. 45 The Elk King. 46 Adrian, the Pilot. 47 The Man-hunter. 48 The Phantom Tracker 49 Moccesin Bill. 50 The Wolf Queen. 51 Tom Hawk, Trailer. 52 The Mad Chief. 33 The Black Wolf.

54 Arkansas Jack.

56 The River Riffes.

55 Blackbeard.

57 Hunter Ham.

58 Cloudwood. The Texas Hawks. Merciless Mat. 61 Mad Ant'ony's Scouts Luckless Trapper. 63 The Florida Scout. The Island Trapper. 65 Wolf-Cap. 66 Rattling Dick. 67 Sharp-Eye. 68 Iron-Hand. 69 The Yellow Hunter, 70 The Phantom rider. 71 Delaware Tom. 72 Silver Riffe. The Skeleton Scout, 74 Little Riffe. 75 The Wood Witch. 76 Old Ruff, Trapper. 17 Scarlet Shoulders. 78 Border Rifleman. 79 Outlaw Jack. Tiger-Tail, Seminole, 81 De th-Dealer. 89 Kenton, the Ranger. 83 Specter Horseman. 84 The Three Trappers. 85 Kaleolah. The Hunter Hercules. Phil Hunter. The Indian Scout. The Girl Avenger. 90 The Rad Hermitees. 21 Star-Face, the Slayer. 99 The Antelope Boy. 97 The Squaw Spy. 98 Dusky Dick.

93 The Phantom Hunter.
94 Tom Pintle, Pilot.
95 The Red Wisard.
96 The Rival Trappers.
97 The Squaw Spy.
98 Dusky Dick.
99 Colonel Crockett.
100 Old Bear Paw.
101 Redlaw.
102 Wild Rube.
103 The Indian Hunters.
104 Scarred Eagle.
105 Nick Doyle.
106 The Indian Spy.
107 Job Dean.
108 The Wood King.
109 The Scalped Hunter.

110 Nick, the Scout.
111 The Texas Tiger.
112 The Crossed Knives.
113 Tiger-Heart.
114 Masked Avenger.

116 Black Panther. 117 Abdiel, the Avenger. 118 Cato, the Creeper. 119 Two-Handed Mat. 190 Mad Trail Hunter. 121 Black Nick. 199 Kit Bird. 198 The Specter Riders. 124 Giant Pete. 125 The Girl Captain. 126 Yankse Eph. 127 Silverspur. 125 Squatter Dick. 129 The Child Spy. 130 Mink Coat. 121 Red Plume.

115 The Pearl Pirates.

182 Clyde, the Trailer.
183 The Lost Cache.
134 The Cannibal Chief.
135 Karaibo.
186 Scarlet Moscasin.
187 Kidnapped.

139 Maid of the Mountain. 139 The Scioto Scouts. 140 Border Renegade. 141 The Mute Chief. 142 Boone, the Hunter.

142 Boone, the Hunter.
143 Mountain Kate.
144 The Red Scalper.
145 The Lone Chief.
146 The Silver Bugle.
147 Chinga, Cheyenne.
148 The Tangled Trail.
149 The Unseen Hand.
150 The Lone Indian.

151 The Branded Chief.
152 Billy Bowlegs.
153 The Valley Scout.
154 Red Jacket.
155 The Jungle Scout.
155 Cherokee Chief.
157 The Bandit Hermit.
158 The Patriot Scouts
159 The Wood Rangers
150 The Red Foe.
161 Beautiful Unknown.

162 Canebrake Mose.

163 Hank, the Guide.

164 The Border Scout. 165 Wild Nat. 166 Maid of Wyoming. 167 The Three Captives. 168 The Lost Hunter.

169 Border Law. 170 The Lifted Trail. 171 The Trader Spy.
172 The Forest Specier.

178 The Border Foes. 174 Border Vengeance. 178 Border Bessle. 176 The Sons of Liberty.

177 The Lost Bride, 178 Kestses. 179 The Tonkawa Spy.

180 The Prairie Scourge.

181 Red Lightning.

182 Brave Heart.

188 Night-Hawk Kit.

184 Mustang Sam.

185 Hurricane Bill.

186 The Red Outlaw.

187 The Swamp Scout.

188 The Shawnee's You.

189 Mohawk Nat. 190 Old Jupe. 191 The Prairie Rifles. 192 Old Kyle, Trailer. 198 Big Foot, the Guide.

194 Red Brotherhood.
195 The Man in Green.
196 Glass-Eye, the Great Shot.
197 The Prairie Trappers

198 Black John.
199 Keen-Knife.
200 Mad Skipper.
201 The Young Spy.
202 The Indian Avenger.
203 Rival Lieutenants.
204 The Swamp Rifles.
205 The Balloon Sc uis.
206 Dacotah Scourge.
207 The Twin Scouts.
208 Buckskin Bill.
209 Border Avengers.

211 The Shawnee Scoul.
212 The Silent Slayer.
213 The Prairie Queen.
214 The Backwoodsmen.
215 The Prisoner of La

210 Tim Bumble's Charge

216 Peleg Smith.
217 The Witch of the Wallowish.
218 The Prairie Pirates.

219 The Hussar Captain. 220 The Red Spy. 221 Dick Darling. 222 Mustang Hunters. 223 Guilty or Not Guilty

224 The Outlaw Ranger.

THE FOLLOWING WILL BE ISSUED IN THE ORDER AND ON THE DATES INDICATED:

225 The Schuylkill Rangers. By the author of "Quindaro." Ready February 6th.
226 On the Deep. By Roger Starbuck. Ready February 20th.
227 Irona. By Edward S. Ellis. Ready March 6th.

228 The Mountaineer. By Edward Willett. Ready March 20th.
229 The Hunter's Escape. By Edward S. Ellis. Ready April 3d.
280 The Golden Belt. By Colin Barker. Ready April 17th.
281 The Swamp Riders. By George D. Gilbert. Ready May 1st.
282 Jabez Hawk. By C. Dunning Clark. Ready May 15th.

288 Massasolt's Daughter. By A. J. H. Duganne. Ready May 29th.
284 The Mad Hunter. By Mrs. Mary A. Denison. Ready June 12th.
285 The Reefer of '76. By Harry Cavendish. Ready June 26th.

286 Antelope Abe, the Boy Guide. By Will Dexter. Ready July 10th.
237 The Hunter's Vow. By Louis Le Grand, M. D. Ready July 24th.

238 The Hunter's Pledge. By Edward Willett. Ready August 7th.
239 Rattlepate. By Scott R. Sherwood. Ready August 21st.

240 The Prairie Bride. By Mrs. Henry J. Thomas. Ready September 4th.

For sale by all Newsdealers; or sent post-paid: single numbers, ten cents; six months (28 Mos.) $1.15 ene year (96 Nos.) $2.50.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William Street, New York,